Dear SPSA Colleagues,

I want to welcome all of you to our 86th Annual Meeting! I am thankful that you have joined us this year. On the eve of the MLK holiday and 50 years after the Voting Rights Act, it seems particularly appropriate for us to gather and discuss the newest discoveries and contributions in political science.

Program Chair Judith Baer and her Program Committee have put together an excellent program for 2015. The SPSA also continues its “conference within a conference” format. These mini-conferences focus sustained attention on a variety of topics, with CWC’s ranging from “Party Manifestos” to “Influences on Judicial Behavior”. Check your Program.

We will also be hosting Addresses and Receptions on both Thursday and Friday night. APSA President Rodney Hero will present an address on Thursday night while I will present the SPSA President’s Address Friday night at 6:00 pm. Each lecture will be followed by a reception, and they are open to all SPSA attendees.

While the main focus will be on these academic panels, I encourage every attendee to take the opportunity to experience some of the great sights, sounds, and food in New Orleans! Please make sure to take advantage of being in such a fantastic host-city. See you in the French Quarter!

I hope you enjoy the Annual Meeting, and we hope to see everyone next year at our 87th Annual Meeting in San Juan, Puerto Rico!

Thomas Carsey
SPSA President

APSA PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS

Dr. Rodney E. Hero

University of California, Berkeley
APSA President 2014 - 2015

Professor Hero's research and teaching focus on American democracy and politics, especially as viewed through the analytical lenses of Latino Politics, Racial/Ethnic Politics, State & Urban Politics, and Federalism. His book, Latinos and the U.S. Political System: Two-tiered Pluralism, received the American Political Science Association's [APSA] 1993 Ralph J. Bunche Award. He also authored Faces of Inequality: Social Diversity in American Politics (which was selected for the APSA's Woodrow Wilson Award in 1999), and Racial Diversity and Social Capital: Equality and Community in America (2007). He is also co-author of MultiEthnic Moments: The Politics of Urban Education Reform (2006); Newcomers, Insiders and Outsiders: Immigrants and American Racial Politics in the Early 21st Century (2009); and Latino Lives in America: Making it Home (2010); Latinos in the New Millennium: An Almanac of Opinion, Behavior, and Policy Preferences (2012). And his 2013 co-authored book, Black-Latino Relations in U.S. National Politics: Beyond Conflict or Cooperation, was chosen for the 2014 'Best Book on Latino Politics Award' given by the Latino Caucus of the APSA. He has also authored and co-authored a number of articles in scholarly journals, and chapters in edited books, and was a co-principal investigator on the Latino National Survey (completed in 2006).

He is President of the American Political Science Association (2014-15). He served as President of the Midwest Political Science Association (2007-08), as a Vice President of the American Political Science Association (2003-04), and President of the Western Political Science Association (1999-2000). He has also served on the editorial board of a number of major political science journals. He previously held faculty positions as Packey J. Dee Professor of American Democracy in the Department of Political Science at the University of Notre Dame (2000-10), at the University of Colorado at Boulder (1989-2000), and at the University of Colorado at Colorado Springs (1980-87)."

MINI- CONFERENCES

In 2015 the SPSA continues the innovation introduced three years ago of hosting extended discussions organized around a single theme. These mini-conferences offer the opportunity for a small community of scholars to set aside time together within the larger meeting. A room is set aside for the time requested, between 3 and 7 regular sessions which occur in succession. Whether these sessions are scheduled on a single day or straddling two days depends on the preferences of the organizer. Some are stand-alone sessions, while others are integrated with their related research section.

If you are interested in organizing a mini-conference to be held in conjunction with the 2016 SPSA meeting, contact David Lewis (the 2016 Program Chair).

While acknowledging Roe v. Wade recognized the state's interest in the fetus, still a 2011 Penn State law journal article felt confident enough to state a "fetus" is clearly not recognized "as a person under the Constitution" and, as a result, a "woman's constitutional status is superior to that of a fetus" (114 Penn St. L. Rev. 955, "Choice in Birth, VBAC," p. 982). However this spring, a mere three years after the publication of that law journal article, a federal circuit court upheld the conviction of a pregnant woman for exposing her "unborn child" to dangerous chemicals by arguing the state has a legitimate interest in protecting the life of children from "their earliest stages of development" (Hicks v. State—So.3rd—2014). The question this panel would like to discuss is what political, social, and rhetorical developments have occurred during the last three years to allow such a shift in the law's perspective on life within a woman's womb. The question has become is a pregnant woman carrying an "unborn child" deserving of equal rights to the woman who carries it or is a pregnant woman carrying a "fetus" whose rights are subsumed to the woman's right to privacy and right to choice in reproductive matters. In light of these distinct views on life in the womb, this panel will provide a comparative political/historical, rhetorical/legal and dramatic analysis of the events over the last three years that have provided the grounds for these two distinct perspectives on the relationship between a woman and her unborn child/fetus. Grounded in the 2011 efforts to pass a personhood amendment in Mississippi, this panel will discuss the historical/political background to the push for constitutional "personhood" amendments throughout not only the United States but also the world at large. Further, in light of the failure of past attempts to pass constitutional amendments, this panel will discuss alternative routes some states are taking today, such as dangerous chemicals acts or requiring abortion doctors to have admitting privileges at local hospitals. Additionally, in light of the relationship between language and reality as expressed in the Shapir-Whorf hypothesis, this panel will explore the potential legal ramifications, as manifested in the recent Hicks decision, that the simple rhetorical act of renaming a "fetus" a "human being" could have on a woman's autonomy over her body during pregnancy. Significantly, the scholarly examinations of this topic will be dramatically embedded within key excerpts from an anthology play inspired by the efforts in Mississippi to pass a personhood amendment. Ultimately, rather than attempting to demonstrate which side is correct, this panel's goal is to motivate individuals, before acting on any of the wide variety of currently proposed initiatives, to think critically about those proposals' long-term rhetorical and legal consequences.

In the wake of the 2012 Presidential election, journalists, politicians and pundits frequently discussed the growing diversity of the American electorate and what that diversity would mean for the future of American politics. Political science research has examined the attitudes and behaviors of women and minority voters for decades, however, little scholarly attention is paid to the intersection of race/ethnicity and gender in shaping political activity in the U.S. The papers in this panel all seek to expand our collective knowledge regarding the impact of multiple identities on political attitudes and behaviors through a focus on minority women in America. Holman's study considers the impact of intersecting identities in shaping political participation, demonstrating that traditional models of political engagement are not sufficient when exploring participation among minority women in the U.S. In their paper, Pantoja and VanSickle-Ward examine attitudes and vote choice among Latinos and Latinas, identifying a significant gender gap in the foreign policies Latinas support and in how those attitudes shape their vote choice. Harvie's paper examines how the intersecting identities of Asian American women in the U.S. shape their political participation, attitudes and citizenship. In her multi-methodological design, Stokes-Brown examines the impact of descriptive representation on African American women's political participation. Capers and Smith's paper explores the concept of linked fate among Black men and women of different ethnicities, comparing political attitudes among African Americans to those of Afro-Caribbean men and women. Finally, Dowe explores the intersection of race, gender and region in her paper, exploring support for African American female candidates among African American voters in the South. This panel will highlight the unique ways the intersecting identities of race, gender and ethnicity shape political behavior in the United States as well as the methodological and theoretical diversity present in contemporary intersectional research. This panel, along with the other panel we are proposing- Intersectional Identities: Race, Gender, Ethnicity and Political Elites in American Politics- will contribute to the SPSA's theme of the 'conference within a conference', allowing participants to focus on the subject of intersectionality in American politics in depth.

This roundtable features a discussion of Corley et al.'s THE PUZZLE OF UNANIMITY, which considers why unanimity is so common on the U.S. Supreme Court, and Haire and Moyer's DOES DIVERSITY MATTER?, which considers when and how diversity among jurists matters for decision making on the U.S. courts of appeals. Both books offer unique perspectives on the tensions between and among various influences on the choices judges make, including individual preferences and legal factors. In doing so, both yield thought-provoking evidence that will inform scholarly understanding of judicial decision making for quite some time.

This proposed panel brings together a series of papers concerned with how minority women negotiate politics in America. In spite of the growth in literature concerning women and minorities, research focused on the intersection of race/ethnicity and gender remains limited. The papers included in this panel examine the political experiences of African American, Latina and Asian American women leaders in the U.S. These papers are diverse in their methodological approaches and data sets, yet are united by a common interest in understanding the challenges faced by contemporary minority women in American politics. Greer's paper "Charlene and Shirley: To Be Young, Gifted, Black and a Woman" explores the campaigns of Charlene Mitchell and Shirley Chisholm, the first black women to run for the presidency, as well as their impact on the presidential campaigns of other minorities. Gillespie and Hartsough focus on the intersection of media, race and gender for some of Americans most prominent un-elected leaders: first ladies. Sriram's paper examines the intersection of race, gender and religion, identifying voter support for hypothetical candidates of European and Indian origin and varying religious identities (Hindu vs Muslim). William's paper "Race, Gender, Region, Representation and Anti-Abortion Policy: A Perspective from Two Southern State Legislatures" examines variation in substantive representation among African American men and women. Burlingame and Ramirez's proposed paper focuses on the future of minority female representation by examining the pool of Latina candidates in the political 'pipeline.' This panel will contribute to the Women and Politics section at SPSA by bringing attention to the often-understudied population of minority women in politics. This panel, along with the other panel we are proposing- Intersectional Identities: Gender, Race, Ethnicity and Political Behavior in the U.S.- further contribute to the SPSA's theme of the 'conference within a conference', allowing participants to focus on the subject of intersectionality in American politics in depth.

This panel will weave together three important themes in Asian politics: political participation, social trust, and national identity. Focusing on China and Taiwan, the five papers address different ways of understanding of the political development in a new era of globalization. Though the topic of democratization in East Asia has received a great deal of scholarly attention this panel offers several new insights by examining new data, asking new questions, applying new approach to existing puzzles, and paying attention to formerly unheard voices. All five papers examine various aspects of these three themes in East Asia with a comparative perspective. Presenter #1's paper attempts to investigate the relationship between political sophistication and political participation in Taiwan, and expects to provide insights into the effects of political sophistication on political participation in Taiwan and compensate for the inadequacy of the research on political sophistication in Taiwan. Presenter #2's paper centers on investigating the relationship between types of protest behaviors and democratic attitude. The results indicate that hard protest behaviors are negatively associated with democratic attitude, whereas soft protest strategies have a positive effect on democratic attitude. Presenter #3's paper aims to seek answers to a relative new research question in political science: What is the time discounting rate of citizens, and its influence on politics and democracy? By attempting to apply the idea of time discounting rate in Asian politics, this article first reviews the measures of inter-temporal choice, mostly in economics and psychology, and categorizes them into three groups: money-based, space-based, and network-based. Result shows that money-based and space-based items have no expected correlation with democratic value, group cohesion, and social capacity. Presenter #4's paper uses a qualitative approach to develop an in-depth understanding of Asian students who are studying abroad in the US and see how the environment affects their national identity. In this research, a strong cultural identification is observed to differentiate Asian students in the US with the Asian American students. Such identification also affects the Asian students' attitudes toward their life in the US. Presenter #5's paper examines whether and how the relationships between countries affect their economic ties by conducting an in-depth qualitative case study of the impact of China-Taiwan relations on Taiwan's economic policy toward China. By tracing the development of China-Taiwan relations and the policy change with regard to cross-strait economic ties during the former President Lee Teng-hui's and former President Chen Shui-bian's Administrations, this paper argues that it is, among other things, the increasingly tense in the China-Taiwan relations that encouraged Lee and Chen to adopt an anti-openness policy at the end. These examinations strive to enhance our understanding of various perspectives of political development in Asia, China and Taiwan in particular. Through this panel, we hope to demonstrate that China and Taiwan may provide a lot of new insights for enduring puzzles in comparative political studies.

This roundtable will consider the relationships between political ideas, religious language, and political behavior as regards the Constitutional legacies of the American Founding. It will consider the deep contexts of what has been a persistent ecclesio-political discourse of American Constitutionalism from its 18th century origins to the contemporary landscape of American Juridical and Constitutional debate. In 1987, as part of the Mormon Church's celebration of the bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution, the church's president, Ezra Taft Benson, famously remarked: "I reverence the Constitution of the United States as a sacred document. To me, its words are akin to the revelations of God." Benson's statement was an overt acknowledgement of an attitude that implicitly animated – and continues to animate – many Americans' understanding of their country's constitution and its founding more generally. Some historians and political theorists believe this reverence for America's founding documents is an important component of a "foundationalism" that is essential to America's survival as a country that was constructed out of an idea – that is, the idea of liberty. Others believe the sacralizing of the Constitution has hindered the amending process and, in so doing, turned America's foundation into a rigid bedrock that betrays the flexibility responsible for constitutionalism's survival in the United States throughout a two-hundred-year period that included civil war. From the polemic of the revolution and the high language of the Declaration, through the ratification of the constitution, to Lincoln's reinvention of tradition at Gettysburg and the second Inaugural we will consider the eighteenth and nineteenth-century transformations of what might be styled as a distinctively American idea of reverential constitutionalism. Such a paradoxical formulation necessarily suggests implications – both positive and negative – for the science of government in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries. It also begs consideration of a deeper controversy at the heart of constitutional and scriptural interpretation. Whether sacred writ is subject to fixed or static interpretations of meaning, all be they disputed, or open to exegetical contestation as a form of emergent theodicy. In secular parlance, we will consider whether law is a matter of original intent and strict interpretation or whether it is to be understood through the lens of human practices, customs and uses, mediated by time. But we will do so by placing that question in the wider frame of a longer ecclesio-political debate about the nature of sovereign authority and the foundations of legitimate power.

It has been widely documented that American women, on average, make 77 cents for each dollar earned by their male counterparts. While the causes of these gender gaps are varied and diverse, the important roles of individual advocacy and salary negotiation cannot be ignored. Administrators, department chairs, university committees, and professional associations may also be important advocates for female faculty members. This panel draws on the diverse experiences of women in the profession to explore both the progress women have made in the academy and the compensation challenges that continue to face female faculty members today.

Although most of the human beings have historically and geographically lived under authoritarian rule, majority of the studies in political science have focused on politics in democratic countries. Foreign policy making is no exception. The papers in this "conference in the conference" try to fill this hole in studies of international relations and comparative politics. We will try to answer the following questions. Is foreign policy making in authoritarian countries different from one in democratic countries? If so, how? The literature of comparative politics has found that authoritarian rulers primarily focus on the regime's survival by using every means possible, including coercive, institutional, and repressive means. Do these efforts for the regime's survival influence foreign policy making of those authoritarian countries? If so, how? Currently, China, an authoritarian country, has emerged as one of the most important countries in the world, and U.S.-China relations have arguably become the most important bilateral international relationship in the world. Moreover, since the movement called the Arab Spring, the U.S. relationship with the Middle Eastern countries has been much more complicated than in the past. What implications does foreign policy making in the authoritarian context have on U.S. foreign policy making? To answer these questions, the papers in the panels draw empirical evidence from politics in China, the Middle East, and other authoritarian countries. Panel 1 focuses on the interactions between foreign policy making and domestic politics (especially public opinion, media, and elections) in authoritarian countries. Panel 2 explores the role of the military and its relationship with other governmental organizations in the authoritarian regime, and discusses the implications on international relations involving authoritarian countries. Panel 3 focuses on China's political economic policies (such as energy, foreign direct investment, and urbanization) and their implications on world politics and economy.

This session will be a roundtable or workshop devoted to the presenters' research designs and proposals. These designs and proposals will be short 3-8 page papers that lay out a proposed experimental design that has not yet been implemented. The purpose of this panel is to provide panelist and audience discussion related to experimental design techniques for research in progress. Importantly, it is also an opportunity for panelists to receive feedback on their proposed experiments before they are fielded. Given the workshop nature of this panel, there will be no specific discussant, as we plan to ask each presenter to also provide feedback on the designs of another participant(s), as well as the general feedback from the other conference participants and audience members.

As co-editor of the edited volume - Civic Education in the 21st Century: A Multidimensional Inquiry, I am proposing a panel where some of the authors of chapters in our volume will discuss their methods and findings in a panel on civic education in the 21st century. Today, Americans (scholars, politicians and even the general public) are increasingly lamenting a "civic crisis" or "recession" in the US (Graham and Hand 2009; Dillon 2011; Johanek 2012). In fact, Dudley and Gitelson suggest research on American civic illiteracy has often taken the character of a race to discover the most appalling lack of knowledge" (Dudley and Gitelson 2002, 176). While most research has focused on documenting the civics crisis and identifying (normatively and empirically) the culprits of it, few scholars have attempted to explain what the US's 21st century civic education process looks like in its various facets. In fact, the bulk of works have too often been singular in focus, looking primarily at formal education, as if it is the totality of our civic education process. While formal education is essential to the civic education process, the presentations based on chapters in the edited volume will demonstrate it is only one facet of it. Inspired by de Tocqueville's Democracy in America, the chapter presentations for the panel collectively suggests the diversity of forces promoting civic education in America today. Just as de Tocqueville's examination of American democracy takes a holistic approach considering everything from our colonial roots, our North-South cultural divide and philosophical disposition to our various governmental institutions, practice of federalism, use of media and group life (1990, 1990), we consider how American history and traditions, schooling, government actors and institutions, and private groups all contribute to the civic education process. While civic education certainly has changed in some fundamental ways in the 21st century from its earlier versions in the 19th and 20th, collectively this panel suggests it is more vibrant than most narrowly focused civic scholarship currently suggests. Thus, Civic Education in the 21st Century brings together political scientists to examine a variety (but not exhaustive) list of civic education mechanisms. To evaluate America's civic education process and/or to fix, it is necessary to consider the entirety of mechanisms that may comprise the typical American's civic socialization. The diagnoses and cure must be multi-dimensional.

The Harvard Business School pioneered the use of cases in its pedagogy and many policy schools, led by the Kennedy School of Government, adapted the tool. In political science, the international relations subfield embraced case teaching as a way to engage students who might be intimidated by quantitative modeling. Case teaching makes sense for many domains, but it is particularly appropriate for women, gender, and sexuality studies, with its epistemological emphasis on women's experience, and the field of leadership studies, where students want to learn from real leaders facing real dilemmas. The focus on real world scenarios appeals to professional schools, adult learners, and undergraduates alike and is a great way to engage students and enliven class discussions. The recent controversy about how the HBS suppresses and excludes its women students has amplified concerns raised by Kenney and Chetkovich and Kirp about how the case model draws heavily on white male decision makers. The Electronic Hallway at the Evans School at the University of Washington, Douglas College of Rutgers University, the Luskin School of Public Affairs, and the Newcomb College Institute of Tulane University, like the Harvard Business School and the Kennedy School of Government, are working to ensure that we produce and use quality cases that integrate women, gender, and feminism into the narrative. This workshop will provide an introduction to case teaching for those who might like to use a case in their classes, will describe the landscape of existing cases and their production, and recruit future case writers.

Although most of the human beings have historically and geographically lived under authoritarian rule, majority of the studies in political science have focused on politics in democratic countries. Foreign policy making is no exception. The papers in this “conference in the conference” try to fill this hole in studies of international relations and comparative politics. We will try to answer the following questions. Is foreign policy making in authoritarian countries different from one in democratic countries? If so, how? The literature of comparative politics has found that authoritarian rulers primarily focus on the regime’s survival by using every means possible, including coercive, institutional, and repressive means. Do these efforts for the regime’s survival influence foreign policy making of those authoritarian countries? If so, how? Currently, China, an authoritarian country, has emerged as one of the most important countries in the world, and U.S.-China relations have arguably become the most important bilateral international relationship in the world. Moreover, since the movement called the Arab Spring, the U.S. relationship with the Middle Eastern countries has been much more complicated than in the past. What implications does foreign policy making in the authoritarian context have on U.S. foreign policy making? To answer these questions, the papers in the panels draw empirical evidence from politics in China, the Middle East, and other authoritarian countries. Panel 1 focuses on the interactions between foreign policy making and domestic politics (especially public opinion, media, and elections) in authoritarian countries. Panel 2 explores the role of the military and its relationship with other governmental organizations in the authoritarian regime, and discusses the implications on international relations involving authoritarian countries. Panel 3 focuses on China’s political economic policies (such as energy, foreign direct investment, and urbanization) and their implications on world politics and economy.

A discussion of Thomas Kleven's book, Equitable Sharing, published by Lexington Press in 2014. The book argues that a principle of equitable sharing, meaning that the benefits and detriments of social life must be fairly distributed among all members of society, is fundamental to the concept of democracy and is implicit in the founding documents of the democratic society the United States purports to be. The book first examines John Locke's libertarianism, John Mill's utilitarianism, and John Rawls' egalitarianism, which represent major strains of Western democratic theory and all of which all contain a principle of equitable sharing in some form. The book then examines the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution. While these documents do not set forth a particular version of equitable sharing, they contain elements of all of Locke's, Mill's and Rawls' philosophies and evidence a commitment to equitable sharing as fundamental to the democratic society they contemplate. The task in this society is to engage throughout its existence in an on-going dialogue that gives life to the commitment to equitable sharing set forth in its founding documents. As the elected representatives of the people and the repository of the powers through which to implement much of what equitable sharing requires, the primary responsibility for implementation rests with the legislative branch. The book argues that the Supreme Court also has a meaningful role to play in the dialogue over the requirements of equitable sharing and can play this role in a manner consistent with democratic principles. This point is illustrated through a discussion of several contemporary issues: same sex marriage, racial integration in public schools, health care, and the regulation of the electoral process.

While claiming to root the centrality of liberal society in the choices individual members make and in the inherent rationality of those choices, neoliberalism is in fact based on a logic of irrational drives which it further maintains and promotes. Individuals do not ever act directly on behalf of the public good or the common well being. Rather they pursue their own narrow self-interest which works according to neoliberalism to the benefit of the system as a whole. This normative transmutation derives from its conception of rationality which rejects the role of reason to evaluate the morality of the passions as guardian of broader norms and social goals. Rational motives for neoliberalism (taken from early pre-ideological liberalism) are those which operate to acquire and achieve systemically authorized markers and goals, regardless of the actual reasons or underlying motives for such acquisition and without regard for any limits on acquisition that might benefit the society. This system, moreover, proclaims the centrality of individual choice as a natural foundation for liberal institutional arrangements without acknowledging the role of child rearing, educational institutions, and consumer culture in shaping citizen desires in line with the existing system of rewards or therefore the self-serving role of its own ideology of natural choice. In this privileging and emphasizing of such obsessive, that is, irrational pursuits, they become in effect rational because their objectives have been determined in advance as systemically reinforcing and containable, that is, they are instrumental conduct whose sole (measurable) virtue is in their directional regularity. The result is a fable of rational choice that such uncontained pursuit of systemic power and leverage in a competitive and vastly stratifying war of all against all will always work to strengthen the system and that any motives designed toward altering or ameliorating the system or its disparities are inherently irrational. This closed definitional universe becomes in effect a form of license for intra-system madness, and for a society that can frame no normative limits or agendas regarding the individual or social good besides advocating more of what it already demands and delivers.

Though women make up over 50 percent of the population in the United States, the number of women elected to serve in all levels of government is small—women still hold limited positions of political power. The broad problem of underrepresentation of women in U.S. state legislatures, however, reaches new heights in the southern state of Louisiana. Statistics bear out the fact that for the past two years, Louisiana is dead last in the number of women in state legislatures. In fact, not only has the numbers stalled, the percentage of women has actually decreased over the last few years! How does this lack of political power affect Louisiana women and the issues they face? With women accounting for only 12.5 percent of the state legislature, one may argue that because women undoubtedly bring a different perspective to government, legislation, and policies, the population of the state suffers as a result of this underrepresentation. Participants of this roundtable, consisting of current women legislators and academics, will discuss implications of gender parity, issues facing women candidates, the contemporary theory of “when women run, women win,” and recommendations on how to proactively engage in getting more women elected.

The papers on this panel thematize the contradictions between neoliberal theory and its concrete institutionalization. Formulated as an alternative to socialism and totalitarian planning, neoliberalism idealizes a world of sovereign individuals interacting in markets so as to maximize the satisfaction of their preferences. Yet neoliberal policies—the privatization of public services and the marketization of private services—actually foster a corporate, organizational world, which itself socializes property and engages in economic planning, but under corporate governance. What is more, this corporate order is sponsored and sustained by government, and exempts itself from the ethic of individual moral responsibility that neoliberalism espouses. In this and other ways, neoliberalism completely misconstrues the nature of the economy it fosters, its connection to government, and its guiding “ethic,” as the panel papers document.

This panel gathers three studies on hotly debated topics of the American Founding: the power and scope of the executive branch, the guarantee of freedom of thought and expression, and the necessity of compromises in the American constitutional design. Each paper examines the defenses of these topics, respectively, in the thought of Alexander Hamilton, Thomas Jefferson, and James Madison. As these papers will show, not only were these defenses of supposed essential principles of the American regime, these were also attempts to inculcate these principles to the discerning public who would assent to and perpetuate their practice. Therefore these papers account for how contentiously debated topics of the American Founding were to be transformed by Hamilton, Jefferson, and Madison into great key characteristics of the regime.

Research and insights about internship practices have not kept pace with the increasing demand for internships nationwide. This roundtable will examine current legal challenges, practices at the departmental level, solutions to common problems, and developing best practices with respect to faculty, students, employers, and administrators. By reviewing the current literature on internship experiences in Political Science and inviting the audience to participate in the discussion, we will address the current state of evidence, assessment processes, requirements, and faculty concerns about internships. Participants will be encouraged to discuss their challenges and experiences, various institutional requirements, and solutions that might alleviate common problems or issues faced by stakeholders. After short presentations by the conveners, there will be time for Q&A. Participants will be invited to collaborate on research projects currently under development.

In the past several decades, state and federal courts have introduced numerous changes in the law of the family, often invoking the Constitution, which says next to nothing explicit about the family. This panel will explore those changes, examining the constitutional argument, developments in common and statutory law, technological innovations, and evolving public opinion, as well as the relative role of judges and other actors (legislators, officials, and voters) in bringing about change. We will consider the question of the law of the family in its own right, but will also ask how the manner of legal change in this area affects American constitutionalism as a whole.

The extant theories of federalism – legal, economic, and political – offer a fairly precise demarcation of the ‘appropriate’ policy domains for different levels of government. For local governments, the policy domains are often defined by low externalities, few economies of scale, and non redistributive in nature. Thus, the policy role of local governments is often conceptualized in quite narrow terms; defined to only a handful of public issues within their specific geographic boundaries. Increasingly, however, local governments – cities in particular – are taking an active role in policy domains that fall outside of this theoretical and conceptual framework (e.g. immigration, gun control, and climate change). Simply stated, as it relates to local governments, the extant theories are no longer adequate. The proposed panel examines what the new role of local governments looks like in the context of different policy areas.

January's meeting of the Southern Political Science Association coincides with the 20th anniversary of the opening of the 104th Congress. Having won control of both chambers for the first time since 1952, Republicans set forth on an ambitious effort "change Washington" and implement their "Contract with America." Please join us for a roundtable discussion where noted congressional scholars reflect upon 20 years of research on parties, party leaders, and polarization.
