Political Philosophy for the Many

Thursday
8:00am-9:30am

Political Theory

Participants

Jarrett Carty, Concordia University

David D Corey, Baylor University

Bryan-Paul Frost, UL-Lafayette

Daniel DiLeo, Penn State Altoona

According to contemporary commentators, political philosophy came into being as a reaction to democracy (Ober) or as a cure for the tyrannic impulses of the most ambitious, capable, and privileged (Bloom). In neither account was it intended for a mass audience. And in fact, in Plato's Republic, Socrates warned against exposing all but those few fully possessed of mature virtue to penetrating examination of conventional presuppositions. Today's teachers of political philosophy take advantage of political philosophy's power to challenge students to examine what they have accepted on faith. If they are bereft of such faith, they may take political philosophy's challenge to convention as a call to destructive iconoclasm or license to indulge immoderate desires. The problem is that we cannot vouch for the mature virtue of our students. The teacher of political philosophy is therefore confronted with profound ethical questions. Should she or he keep the radically zetetic essence of political philosophy under wraps, saving it for those who have built a record of serious study over a number of courses and have come to be known through informal conversations? One cost of doing so is to make initial studies less exciting or more ideological than they should be. Or is it best to introduce students to radical inquiry from the start, perhaps relying on the sad assumption that its impact will be only superficial and temporary. The purpose of this panel is to explore these questions.

We propose a round table discussion on the state of applied politics research. This includes, but is not limited to: the role of political consultants in campaigns; strategy and tactics in campaigns related to advertising, fundraising and spending; the use of technology; etc. It can also include lobbying. A second purpose of the panel is to honor the contributions of James A. Thurber (Director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies) to this field of study throughout his career. The panelists will discuss key questions related to the study of applied politics over the last two decades including what has been done, what is left to do, what are the hurdles that are present, etc. The participants will be: Paul Herrnson, UConn; Dennis Johnson, George Washington University; Robin Kolodny, Temple University; Stephen Medvic, Franklin and Marshall College Dave Dulio (Oakland University) and Sam Garrett (Congressional Research Service) will co-chair. James A. Thurber (American University) will provide comments after the round table.

This panel addresses the absence of agency in alleviating seemingly intractable human security issues around the globe. The panel identifies some key social issues that are rendered intractable due to the prevailing legal frameworks of sovereignty that defined state interactions. Issues are seen as difficult or impossible to rectify because the victim populations lack a meaningful mechanism of expression through existing advocacy networks. Furthermore, some fundamental problems are inherent in the state's inability to provide for human security for transnational or universal issues which undermines efforts at legal or civil enforcement of these global issues. Papers presented will address issues of refugee human rights in the EU, activists for women and children in developing regions of the world, and mental health services for the poor and minority populations. The populations who are most at risk are those who lack agency within their own social systems. Due to their lack of agency, not only are they denied meaningful access for changing their social condition, but the transnational advocacy networks that seek to mitigate prevailing risks to the communities are often subject to human rights violations as well. The panel proposes a re-evaluation of existing mechanisms for promoting agency in light of transnational issues and the marginalized populations that suffer most as a result. The panelists promote legislative innovation, community education policies, and increases in transparency and accountability among stakeholders, including the advocacy networks themselves, to maximize trust and cross-community cooperation as the path toward promoting agency-building for the disenfranchised.

In our present age of intense ideological polarization and social conflict, American citizens are prone to wonder what is going on: Why is our political life suddenly so fractured? How much upheaval can a polity bear? What steps if any might we take to shore up and sustain a sense of political community amidst the chaos? These are questions this panel addresses directly. All four panelists and our two discussants are committed to exploring the elements of healthy political community and identifying some of the root causes of the forces that afflict it. One element of political health we examine is the vital importance of a fair deliberative process that does not violate the freedom and formal equality of the participants. Another is the presence of a free and rich associational life among citizens, one that is not a concession or gift of the state, but rather a source of meaning and authority in its own right. Of the many forces that work against political community in our present age, we focus on two in particular. The first is ideology in the negative sense of the word—a totalizing system of dogmatically held beliefs about the social world that generates decisive (often violent) action. We are critical of the ideological approach to politics and offer ways to temper it. The second is technological innovation. We are critical not of innovation per se but of its social side effects such as inequality and segregation among citizens. This too we seek to temper by proposing ways of politically evaluating technological developments.

Working at the juncture of two disciplines, political science and linguistics, our proposed panel is focused on the concept of "political culture," particularly as it is shaped by what in the field of linguistics is often called "linguistic relativity." More specifically, we draw on the works of 20th century phenomenologists Edmund Husserl and Alfred Schutz and linguistic theorists Edward Sapir and Benjamin Whorf. The efforts of the latter two are popularly referenced in linguistic theory as the Sapir-Whorf Hypothesis. Although there is much nuance and controversy surrounding debates regarding this hypothesis, it generally holds that "the world is differently experienced and conceived in different linguistic communities" (Brown and Lenneberg 1954, 455). Combining insights from this tradition in linguistic theory with aspects of the above referenced scholars in philosophy and political science, participants on our proposed panel, working with German, Japanese, Spanish, and Arabic languages and cultures, wish to challenge whether diminishing language requirements in graduate political science programs is wise policy.

As this panel is being constructed, Donald Trump has secured the Republican presidential nomination and is surging in the polls. Hillary Clinton, who has been the presumed Democratic nominee for years, is having difficulty rallying young voters who would have preferred Bernie Sanders as their candidate. What is happening, and how did we get here? From Tea Party legislators, to religious activists, to populist uprisings, this panel explores the landscape of contemporary party politics and how we got from apparent "dealignment" in the 1960's and 70's to the polarization we see today.

President Barack Hussein Obama will leave office January 20th 2017. Obviously his tenure has been both an historical and complex one. There is now a record that will tell us much about the last eight years. His foreign policy has been surprisingly traditional and we now have enough history to make predictions about what type of world the next president will inherit from the Obama policies. Granted scholars will have to wait for the declassification of government documents before they can make a definitive judgment about the Obama foreign policy. Obama's domestic policies seem much clearer. We can now say that there have been unexpected achievements and failures. The President has been foursquare and successful in the passage of Affordable Health Care Act, rethinking the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, promoting equal rights for LGBT Americans, forthright about racial discrimination and promoting school reform (ESSA). The Affordable Care Act, also called Obamacare, attracted many critics but it still may be his long lasting legacy. So far the Congress has blocked his attempts at Immigration Reform. This roundtable of president watchers will review Obama's tenure in office and his possible legacies. The roundtable participants will address the following questions: What is the current state of Obama's health reform? What are the President's foreign policy triumphs and failures? What are the possible futures for immigration reform? Will his school reform program fail? What are some of the policy spillover issues for the next Administration? This roundtable will be, at best, a preliminary analysis of the legacy of President Obama but we hope to identify some emerging indicators and their implications for American Presidential Politics.

Over the past decade, congressional Republicans, and to some extent Democrats as well – have exhibited signs of increased internal factionalism, which in turn has complicated the job of party leader in Congress. These internal party divisions have been reflected in and reinforced by the remarkable 2016 campaign. The purpose of this roundtable is to explore the implications of party factionalism for the leading theories of congressional partisanship and the likely consequences for campaigns and legislating in the years ahead. Lethal Confrontation: Excessive Force Accusations Over the Last DecadeFriday
1:15pm-2:45pmUndergraduate Research and Training

This project comes after increased public debate and classroom discussion regarding incidents of law enforcement's use of "excessive" or "deadly" force. The twenty-two students in my senior-level Civil Rights/Civil Liberties course are investigating beyond social-media reports. This semester, they are ambitiously researching prior studies, looking into reporting inconsistencies, and collecting state-level data of actual excessive-force or brutality cases over the last ten years from all fifty states. With this data we hope to elucidate whether the occurrences of police brutality have actually increased; the demographic information of both officer and alleged victim; and at what governmental level and to what extent these allegations are investigated. We also hope to clarify possible disparities in the use of terms and laws across states (excessive force, brutality, etc.).

Title: "An Extraordinary Election: One of a Kind or Window to the Future." Moderator: William J. Crotty
 The election of 2016 is most unusual. It has no precedent in modern American history. It deserves serious attention and analysis on a number of levels. This is the purpose of the proposed roundtable, "An Extraordinary Election: One of a Kind or Window to the Future." The roundtable is composed of top-level analysts of American elections and politics, each with a formidable list of publications and contributions to an understanding of the dynamics of representation, approached from different perspectives, in a democratic society. The meaning of the election for a restrained conception of democratic leadership equal to the task of leading the world's greatest power in a time of international crisis will represent a subtext of the panel presentation.

How can institutions connect students of women and politics to practitioners? Although the Democratic Party has nominated its first woman for President, there is still a dearth of underrepresentation of women in politics at the local, state, and federal levels. How are institutions preparing its female students for the challenge of succeeding in the current political environment? The roundtable will address various approaches that include role-playing; service-learning; and scholar-practitioner collaborations.

This panel proposes to examine the political thought of the Great Triumvirate. In considering Calhoun, Webster and Clay, the panel will consider their approaches to populism, the character of the American founding and the substance of civic virtue and statecraft in a democratic republic. The panel will contend that the treatment of these issues by these three, offers insights useful to understanding permanent qualities of American politics. The papers proposed will each focus on one member of the triumvirate while at the same time noting the positions of the other two and of a third party that was often in their thoughts, an undercurrent in so many of their later writings: Andrew Jackson.

In 2013, The Economist said that year was the “biggest year for democracy ever,” and in the wake of the Arab Spring of 2011, the world seemed to finally be advancing toward that democratic utopia that Francis Fukuyama predicted in The End of History and the Last Man. But between then and now, something has changed. Now the original stability of the liberalized Arab regimes seems to be slipping, and The Economist’s front page touts an article called “What’s Gone Wrong with Democracy.” Although most of the human being have historically and geographically lived under authoritarian rule, majority of the studies in political science have focused on politics in democratic countries. This conference-within-the-conference tries to fill this hole in political science. Why have some authoritarian regimes been resilient (like China so far)? What makes authoritarian governments stay in power? Paths Out of Dixie examines the dramatic political changes in the American South after World War II through the lens of democratization. Robert Mickey argues that Southern states after Reconstruction were governed by authoritarian regimes, led by white Democrats to sustain white supremacy, the agricultural economy, and their political careers. From the 1940s to the 1970s, these regimes were beset by democratizing forces. Politicians and institutions in southern states varied in their responses to these forces. Mickey examines political change in Georgia, Mississippi, and South Carolina to argue that the paths each state took in response to the civil rights movement continue to shape politics today. He offers a unique perspective on political development in the South.

Blair Center Clinton School Poll 2016, Early FindingsSaturday
9:45am-11:15amSouthern Politics

The 2016 Blair Center Clinton School Poll (BCCS) conducted by Knowledge Networks includes a large national sample, as well as oversamples of Southerners, African Americans (both inside and outside of the South, and Hispanics (both inside and outside of the South), providing for multiple comparisons across region, race, gender, and ethnicity. Key questions include policy positions on guns, Black Lives Matter, climate change, immigration, and terrorism, among others. Major scales measuring racial animus, religiosity, and modern sexism allow for deeper analysis of the motivations driving respondents' attitudes. The roundtable will offer key findings and discuss avenues of potential research from the brand new data.

With faculty from a variety of institutions, our roundtable explores the challenges and opportunities for mentoring undergraduate research. Faculty will discuss departmental and institutional initiatives to promote undergraduate research opportunities. The roundtable will examine best practices and lessons learned from mentoring undergraduate political science research. Furthermore, the roundtable will identify resources, such as the Council on Undergraduate Research, that are available to faculty who are novices or veterans at mentoring undergraduate research. Audience participation and feedback will be encouraged throughout the discussion.

In 2013, The Economist said that year was the “biggest year for democracy ever,” and in the wake of the Arab Spring of 2011, the world seemed to finally be advancing toward that democratic utopia that Francis Fukuyama predicted in The End of History and the Last Man. But between then and now, something has changed. Now the original stability of the liberalized Arab regimes seems to be slipping, and The Economist’s front page touts an article called “What’s Gone Wrong with Democracy.” Although most of the human being have historically and geographically lived under authoritarian rule, majority of the studies in political science have focused on politics in democratic countries. This conference-within-the-conference tries to fill this hole in political science. Why have some authoritarian regimes been resilient (like China so far)? What makes authoritarian governments stay in power? Interestingly, many authoritarian regimes have faced social unrest, and they have been democratized in some cases while they have survived in other cases. What explanations would account for this variation? To answer this question, the papers in the panels draw empirical evidence from politics in China, the Middle East, and other authoritarian countries. Panel 1 focuses on how authoritarian rulers institutionalize governance for survival of the regime, Panel 2 highlights how rulers manage political communication and information to maintain the authoritarian regime, and Panel 3 explores the implications of economic globalization on authoritarian politics.

In 2013, The Economist said that year was the “biggest year for democracy ever,” and in the wake of the Arab Spring of 2011, the world seemed to finally be advancing toward that democratic utopia that Francis Fukuyama predicted in The End of History and the Last Man. But between then and now, something has changed. Now the original stability of the liberalized Arab regimes seems to be slipping, and The Economist’s front page touts an article called “What’s Gone Wrong with Democracy.” Although most of the human being have historically and geographically lived under authoritarian rule, majority of the studies in political science have focused on politics in democratic countries. This conference-within-the-conference tries to fill this hole in political science. Why have some authoritarian regimes been resilient (like China so far)? What makes authoritarian governments stay in power? Interestingly, many authoritarian regimes have faced social unrest, and they have been democratized in some cases while they have survived in other cases. What explanations would account for this variation? To answer this question, the papers in the panels draw empirical evidence from politics in China, the Middle East, and other authoritarian countries. Panel 1 focuses on how authoritarian rulers institutionalize governance for survival of the regime, Panel 2 highlights how rulers manage political communication and information to maintain the authoritarian regime, and Panel 3 explores the implications of economic globalization on authoritarian politics.

The vice presidency has long been the subject of ridicule. However, since World War II, there has been profound changes over the very function of the vice presidency and consequently over the quality of its occupants. Several factors explain these changes, such as the expansion of the U.S. role around the globe and the growing complexity of political issues. Two important constitutional changes also contributed to the transformation of the role of vice president: the 22nd Amendment to the Constitution (1951), as it turns the vice-presidency into a springboard for the country's highest political office; and the 25th Amendment (1967), which ensures that the vice president shall become president in case of the death or incapacitation of the president. Furthermore, tragic events have propelled unprepared vice presidents to the Oval Office during troubled times, such as Truman in 1945 and Ford in 1974. Since then, presidential candidates have every incentive to be more careful as they choose their running mate and to involve them in their decision making process in a more significant way. This resulted in the phasing out of ceremonial duties of the vice presidency in favor of a more governmental and diplomatic roles. This shows that vice presidents are increasingly important figures in the decision-making process, becoming active presidential advisers. The presentations of this panel aim to expose how the changes that have affected the vice presidency since World War II have transformed the institution itself and the place occupied by vice presidents in the policy decision-making process, but foremost to see if those changes allow them to exert real influence on the president and on the United States policy.

Resilient Farmers, Resilient Beans, Resilient Cities?: Examining Coffee's Global Supply Chain from Cup to Cafe

New Orleans is among one of the U.S.'s most resilient cities after recovering from Hurricane Katrina in 2005. Since New Orleans has held the premier coffee port in the U.S. for almost two centuries, with more than a dozen warehouses devoted solely to coffee, there is no better "resilient city" to hold this internationally vital discussion. This panel will consider the global and national imperative of resilience by looking at the 21st century global coffee chain and the specialty coffee industry, by considering the following questions: • How have coffee farmer-producers have demonstrated resilience to date? • Is such resilience sustainable, considering growing threats of climate change and its impact for all agricultural crops, including coffee? • Is such resilience sustainable, considering the challenges of farmer-producers in coffee, which include an aging farmer population and youth migration to cities? • What political and economic structures help or impede resilience for coffee farmer-producers? • What trade and business practices help or hinder resilience for coffee farmer-producers? • What role do U.S. roasters and cafés play in creating resilience for this complex supply chain? • What role do U.S. cafés play in creating resilient cities and communities? Using coffee as a focus matters, not only because it remains one of the world's most important agriculturally traded commodities, but also because the global north continues in patterns of trade and consumption that affect the livelihoods of more than 25 million farmer-producers in the global south. This interdisciplinary panel – comprised of academics and practitioners in the specialty coffee industry – seeks to lead an urgent discussion of the political and economic structures that impede that work of humanitarian and aid organizations. This panel will explore the politics of the coffee supply chain by utilizing frameworks of resilience. Considering that New Orleans is experiencing an increase of "third wave coffee cafes" even as post-Katrina recovery continues, the 2017 SPSA conference is a perfect place for this panel to feature issues of sustainability, gender equity, and injustice in one of our world's most important agricultural global supply chains, and its impact on U.S. cities.

New Orleans suffered catastrophic flooding in Hurricane Katrina a little over one decade ago. The hurricane destroyed infrastructure, expelled a sizeable portion of the population, and directed national and international attention to the city, bringing funding and new plans for redevelopment. The disruption of the aftermath unleashed a struggle for control of the city and its development. After a decade of rapid change, this panel explores the politics of New Orleans in terms of political, social, policy, and economic trends. Existing political arrangements, especially the voting blocs that swayed elections, decayed and reorganized around new cleavages. New social actors have articulated agendas, formed organizations, and pressed for access to politics and policy. New policy and institutional frameworks, both imposed from outside and indigenously designed, have emerged to govern important activities. New economic sectors, and the actors who lead them, reorganize the way production, work, and accumulation occur in the city. With so much that is new, it is time to take stock and evaluate how much has changed, with what impacts, to whose benefit, and how the current moment fits into major periods in the history of the city. What is new about the new New Orleans? This panel brings together political scientists who have been looking closely at New Orleans for most of the last decade. Their research touches on political, social, policy, and economic aspects of change, drawing on literatures from urban politics, public opinion, education, and international development. There is a cottage industry of partial views of New Orleans after Katrina, but there have been few attempts to put the current moment of city politics in the context of socio-economic shifts and historical trajectories of change. This panel invites academic and policy observers to weigh the nature of changes in the city and draw conclusions about likely future balances of power and directions of the city's evolution.

In 1976, Daniel Bell in The Cultural Contradictions of Capitalism laid forth the argument that American liberal society had reached a turning point: the tensions among and within its discrete sectors – politics, culture, the economy – were evolving into full blown contradictions, pitting these sectors against each other. The result in his view was a great “trial” for American liberalism which raised the question whether “it can survive.” As the polarizations and tensions have further sharpened in the neoliberal age of late capitalism, Bell’s sharply observed reflections and daunting questions regarding the structural and moral viability of the American system have also taken on greater urgency in this period. Participants in this panel will provide analyses regarding distinct dimensions of these cultural contradictions as they have evolved since Bell’s work, and will offer a vibrant set of alternatives on the liberal prospects for dealing with these. The focus ultimately will be on the compelling question “What is to be done?,” either within or beyond the liberal framework.

As the U.S. military remains the most trusted institution in the nation after 15 years of war, defense and military scholars are finding renewed interest in U.S. civil-military relations. Featuring scholarly expertise from active duty and retired military officers, this panel explores the many formal and informal aspects of U.S. civil-military relations. Papers in the panel include works exploring Congress and the defense budget, military pensions and their impact on veterans and society, a stewardship theory of civ-mil relations, presidential directives and bureaucratic drift in the Pentagon, and new media's impact on members of the military. Indeed, research of this sort should be considered timely and relevant for all students of American politics, public policy, and democratic institutions.
