This panel examines electoral politics and political behavior in Africa. Choi, Gichohi, and Opalo explore the effect of campaign rallies on vote choice. They leverage a set of natural experiments during the 2017 Kenyan elections and demonstrate that the effect of rallies is conditional on the partisan and ethnic makeup of the constituencies where they are held. Kerr and Wahman examine opposition challenges of parliamentary results in the court. They find the effect of court rulings on voters' assessment of electoral quality in the context of the 2016 Zambian elections. Negative rulings are correlated with opposition and independent voters rating the elections to be a lower quality; they also find limited support that independents rate election to be higher quality after positive rulings. Letsa uses Afrobarometer data from 9 electoral autocracies to show that mass parties and opposition parties court different types of independent voters. She finds that strong opposition parties pursue voters with higher socio-economic status, while mass parties rely on patronage or coercion to win over lower socio-economic status voters. Bleck, Fridy, and Friesen use a conjoint survey experiment in Northern Ghana to demonstrate that citizens' personality traits, values, and experiences are predictive of political preferences and behavior.

The Armed Conflict Location & Event Data Project (ACLED) is a disaggregated conflict collection, analysis and crisis mapping project. ACLED collects the dates, actors, types of violence, locations, and fatalities of all reported political violence and protest events across Africa, South Asia, South East Asia, the Middle East, Europe, and Latin America. Political violence and protest includes events that occur within civil wars and periods of instability, public protest and regime breakdown. ACLED's aim is to capture the forms, actors, dates and locations of political violence and protest as it occurs across states.

Thomas Hobbes and the Natural LawThursday
11:00am-12:20pmPolitical Theory*Critics

James Stoner, Louisiana State University

Kevin Stuart, Austin Institute

William McCormick, St. Louis University

Author

Kody Cooper, UTC

In the second half of the 20th century, there was an explosion of new interest in the political philosophy of Thomas Hobbes. While interest in Hobbes had waxed and waned over the years, the new interest in Hobbes seemed to dovetail with a renewed interest in the foundations of political life after WWII. But, has Hobbesian moral and political theory been fundamentally misinterpreted by most of his readers? Since the criticism of John Bramhall, Hobbes has generally been regarded as advancing a moral and political theory that is antithetical to classical natural law theory. In his new book, Thomas Hobbes and the Natural Law, Kody W. Cooper challenges this traditional interpretation of Hobbes. Cooper contends that Hobbes affirms two essential theses of classical natural law theory: the capacity of practical reason to grasp intelligible goods or reasons for action and the legally binding character of the practical requirements essential to the pursuit of human flourishing. Hobbes's novel contribution lies principally in his formulation of a thin theory of the good. Accordingly, the book seeks to prove that Hobbes has more in common with the Aristotelian-Thomistic tradition of natural law philosophy than has been recognized. According to Cooper, Hobbes affirms a realistic philosophy as well as biblical revelation as the ground of his philosophical-theological anthropology and his moral and civil science. In addition, Cooper contends that Hobbes's thought, although transformative in important ways, also has important structural continuities with the Aristotelian-Thomistic tradition of practical reason, theology, social ontology, and law. We propose in this panel to reexamine Thomas Hobbes's relationship to the natural law tradition in light of Cooper's thesis. Each panelist has interest and expertise in natural law theory, and plans to offer critical reflections on the central theses of the book. The panel will also raise larger questions about the relationship of natural law to liberalism and the contemporary viability of natural law theory. The following scholars have confirmed their intention to participate: Dr. Kevin Stuart, The Austin Institute Dr. James Stoner, Louisiana State University Dr. William McCormick, Saint Louis University

A much discussed recent publication attempting to make sense of the turbulent times in global political dynamics is Pankaj Mishra's Age of Anger: A History of the Present. Our proposed panel offers four perspectives on Mishra's analysis. Monica Alfaro Rodriguez examines how the approach to historical analysis represented by the Cambridge School, particularly as expressed in the work of J.G.A. Pocock, can take us "away from anger;" Sarah Armor questions Mishra's understanding of classical liberalism in the West; Sylvia Gonzalez, from a political behavior perspective, examines anger and anxiety in modern politics; and Phillip Pierce argues that the expansion of the global marketplace has changed political identities in the direction of corporate ones. Proposed discussants bring their expertise on citizenship (Samah Elhajibrahim), the rise of right wing populism, especially in Europe, (Jon Olsen), and in the field of linguistics (Haj Ross). We believe our panel and papers will be of interest to anyone teaching and doing research in comparative and American politics, in both normative and empirical political theory, those simply interested in a robust exchange on current events involving global political dynamics, and, of course, those interested in Mishra's analysis.

With faculty and former students from a variety of institutions, our roundtable explores the challenges and opportunities for mentoring undergraduate research. Faculty will discuss departmental and institutional initiatives to promote undergraduate research opportunities. The former students will talk about the benefits they received from the experience and how it has prepared them for graduate school and the workforce. The roundtable will examine best practices and lessons learned from mentoring undergraduate political science research. Furthermore, the roundtable will identify resources, such as the Council on Undergraduate Research, that are available to faculty who are novices or veterans at mentoring undergraduate research. Audience participation and feedback will be encouraged throughout the discussion.

This roundtable seeks to assess the political prospects of President Trump's populism and its impact on U.S. democracy through a dialogue among specialists on American and Comparative Politics. Through this wide-ranging approach, the roundtable seeks to shed light on a phenomenon -- a populist leader as chief executive -- that is unusual for the U.S., but that has been quite common in Europe and especially in Latin America. Can these international experiences suggest valid and useful lessons for the U.S. case? How will the typical patterns of populist politics play out in the U.S., given the specific institutional and societal context of this country and its differences with nations where populist chief executives have been more common?

Author Meets Critics--Poor Representation: Congress and the Politics of Poverty in the United StatesThursday

Author

Kristina Miler, University of Maryland

Tens of millions of Americans live in poverty, but Kristina C. Miler's book reveals that they receive very little representation in Congress. While a burgeoning literature examines the links between political and economic inequality, Miler's book is the first to comprehensively examine the poor as a distinct constituency. Drawing on three decades of data on political speeches, party platforms, and congressional behavior, Miler first shows that, contrary to what many believe, the poor are highly visible to legislators. Yet, the poor are grossly underrepresented when it comes to legislative activity, both by Congress as a whole and by individual legislators, even those who represent high-poverty districts. To take up their issues in Congress, the poor must rely on a few surrogate champions who have little district connection to poverty but view themselves as broader advocates and often see poverty from a racial or gender-based perspective.

This panel will be a roundtable discussion of Church's book, Nietzsche's Culture of Humanity. Nietzsche scholars have long been divided over whether Nietzsche is an aristocratic or a democratic thinker. Nietzsche's Culture of Humanity overcomes this debate by proving both sides wrong. Jeffrey Church argues that in his early period writings, Nietzsche envisioned a cultural meritocracy that drew on the classical German tradition of Kant and Herder. The young Nietzsche's "culture of humanity" synthesized the high and low, the genius and the people, the nation and humanity. Nietzsche's early ideal of culture can shed light on his mature period thought, since, Church argues, Nietzsche does not abandon this fundamental commitment to a cultural meritocracy. Nietzsche's Culture of Humanity argues that Nietzsche's novel defense of culture can overcome some persisting problems in contemporary liberal theories of culture. As such, this book should interest Nietzsche scholars, political theorists, and philosophers interested in modern thought, as well as contemporary thinkers concerned with the politics of culture.

Introduction to Using the Tableau Application with ACLED data

Thursday
3:30pm-4:50pm

Program Chair's PanelsChair

Roudabeh Kishi, University of Wisconsin - Madison

The Armed Conflict Location & Event Data Project (ACLED) is a disaggregated conflict collection, analysis and crisis mapping project. ACLED collects the dates, actors, types of violence, locations, and fatalities of all reported political violence and protest events across Africa, South Asia, South East Asia, the Middle East, Europe, and Latin America. Political violence and protest includes events that occur within civil wars and periods of instability, public protest and regime breakdown. ACLED's aim is to capture the forms, actors, dates and locations of political violence and protest as it occurs across states. This workshop will teach researchers how to use Tableau to describe data in class and in print.

This year's proposals contained an outstanding set of proposals using new data or new measurement techniques, some of which were on similar topics. Taking advantage of this synergy, I created a set of panels "Novel data, novel measures" to profile these new data or measurement methodologies, with the intention of turning them into workshops. In the spirit of advanced methods training, these panels are often smaller than the other panels to provide a chance for the researchers to emphasize not only the findings but also showcase the new data or measurement strategies, giving presenters and the audience a chance to learn from one another.

I am proposing a panel comprised of three participants in the "Presidential Swing States" project, an on-going edited volume on the Presidential elections in swing states. The first edition was published in 2015, covering the 2012 election (Hecht and Schultz, eds., Lexington Books) and the second edition was published in 2018 (Schultz and Jacob). The panel will consist of papers by Dante Scala, Associate Professor, University of New Hampshire, David Dulio, Professor and Director of the Center for Civic Engagement at Oakland University in Michigan, and John McGlennon, Professor, College of William & Mary in Virginia. Each presenter will analyze the outcome of the 2018 midterm elections in its state and contextualize it in relation to the 2016 and 2020 Presidential elections.

In authoritarian typologies, personalist dictatorships are often characterized by their lack of institutional constraints – thereby, rendering them distinct from party and military dictatorships. Put differently, personalist dictatorships operate outside parties; and party dictatorships constrain their executives. All five papers in this panel challenge this conceptualization – whether it is shifting the focus to the resources, threats, or policy changes. Empirically, two of the papers [Meng and Sumne] offer new global measures to improve on the extant ones; and the remaining three [Liu, Ding, Schuler] focus on China in a comparative perspective.

At some point around the middle of the Thirteenth Century, Thomas Aquinas composed a letter on the subject of Kingship. It was apparently never sent or even completed by Thomas himself, but it remained in his papers and became a classic text within Christianity for answering a host of important political questions. The text itself and the historical circumstances of its composition have received new scholarly attention in recent times, however—so much so that a significant body of scholarship has grown up around the text. This panel session, composed of four papers, seeks to explore some of the many new discussions to which Thomas's De regno has given rise.

This year's proposals contained an outstanding set of proposals using new data or new measurement techniques, some of which were on similar topics. Taking advantage of this synergy, I created a set of panels "Novel data, novel measures" to profile these new data or measurement methodologies, with the intention of turning them into workshops. In the spirit of advanced methods training, these panels are often smaller than the other panels to provide a chance for the researchers to emphasize not only the findings but also showcase the new data or measurement strategies, giving presenters and the audience a chance to learn from one another.

This roundtable will discuss gender and identity in the political science classroom, given the many divides facing Americans in the Trump presidency. Inclusivity, tolerance, and civil dialogue are important in the classroom, but as the national conversation among highly involved partisans has opened up to include openly racist, sexist, and xenophobic talking points, we as professors need to evaluate how to deal with such assertions in the college classroom. How can we identify--quickly--whether a student's remark is a sexist personal attack or a partisan talking point? As Seth Masket recently pointed out in "The Crisis in Political Science Education" (Pacific Standard, July 16, 2018), "If we call it out, are we defending classroom inclusivity or are we attacking a student for his partisan beliefs?" This roundtable will feature faculty from a variety of backgrounds and who teach at various types of colleges/universities in rural and urban areas, private and public institutions, and other differences that invite a conversation about how to best teach political science in the college classroom in 2019.

There is continuous discussion and debate about the who, what, and why of the political divisions among U.S. citizens. This panel brings together four experimental projects that (1) distinguish between identity-driven and policy-driven social distance; (2) explore how the timing of the partisanship question impacts the polarization of subsequent responses; (3) test how the sorting of the popularity of news contributes to affective polarization; and (4) examine how partisan discrimination impacts real-world settings.

Modern representative democracy entails a chain of delegation from voters to elected politicians to unelected bureaucrats, and a reverse chain of accountability. The papers in this panel focus on the delegation and accountability relationships between the two latter actors: politicians and bureaucrats. The first two papers examine the roles and degree of influence of politicians and bureaucrats in the legislative process. First, Kroeger examines the extent to which state-level bureaucrats in the United States manage to secure their preferred statutory language in legislation. Smith and Goplerud, in contrast, focus on who is accountable to the national legislature for explaining government policy in Japan—bureaucrats or government ministers—and how this accountability role has shifted following institutional reforms. The second pair of papers deal with questions of bureaucratic turnover and delegation of policymaking authority. Fiva, Geys, Heggedal, and Sørensen explore whether politicians in Norway delegate more responsibility to, and retain for longer, bureaucrats whose policy orientations match their own. Finally, Moreira, Akhtari, and Trucco use a regression discontinuity design on close elections to investigate the impact of political and bureaucratic turnovers on educational public goods provision in Brazil. The range of cases and approaches represented in this panel shed important comparative light on the roles and relationships of politicians and bureaucrats in democracies.

The fear that developed in response to fascist movements leading up to World War II required theoretical and empirical responses from social scientists to study why such movements had gained so many followers. Members of the Frankfurt School primarily generated this research, which focused heavily on the concept of alienation. Historically, alienation in a neoliberal context has taken many forms, from the labor-generated pathologies theorized by Marx, to the development of alienation in response to periods of international crisis prompted by Frankfurt School theorists such as Horkheimer, Adorno and Fromm. With the rise and interest in mass populism around the world today, alienation as a way of understanding social and political phenomena can once again be utilized to help us understand the recent populist resurgence. This panel seeks to elicit diagnoses to the contemporary socio-political phenomenon of mass populism by applying traditional and novel theoretical, qualitative and quantitative approaches to the concept of alienation to conceptualize the nature of the contemporary rise in populism in an all too familiar neoliberal society. What we hope to get out of this research is an understanding of whether traditional measures of alienation substantially explain this contemporary rise in populist ideals, or if a reformulation of the concept of alienation is necessary to capture the complexities of contemporary political behavior.

A separation of powers system operates, in theory, to allow political actors to exercise their legislative, executive, or judicial power while constraining their ability to abuse those powers. In the United States, there has been an ongoing debate about whether the presidency has become too powerful, upsetting the balance of power, or whether, instead, the presidency has been too constrained, unable to meet the framers' desire for the unitary executive to act with energy and dispatch. The first two years of the Trump presidency certainly provide many examples of these tensions, with a number of injunctions imposed by courts against many of his executive actions, with congressional investigations of the 2016 election, and with ongoing tension with his Department of Justice and the special counsel investigation. Old questions have arisen again: Can a sitting president be indicted? How much deference is the president due in matters of national security and foreign affairs? How much control can the president exercise over the bureaucracy? Novel questions have arisen as well: Can a president pardon himself? Are there any limits or checks on the pardon power? This panel will explore these questions in the context of the Trump presidency. In what ways do Trump's actions in the first two years continue trends that have long existed in the operation of the U.S. political system? What is different or extraordinary? What are the implications for U.S. politics and constitutionalism of these developments? The panel will consist of political science scholars who study the presidency and the separation of powers. The roundtable discussion will place the Trump presidency in the context of historical developments in the area about which they write: national security/foreign policy, the pardon power, executive control of the bureaucracy, the DOJ and independent counsel, and relations with Congress and the courts. The roundtable will also represent the first meeting of the group to discuss the development of an edited volume on the subject.

There are burgeoning literatures focused on social media and political behavior. This work focuses, for instance, on the nature of social media content, the structure of online social networks, the use of social media as tool to understand political behavior, and the impact that social media use and/or content has on a wide range of political attitudes and behaviors. Scholars are working on these themes in Political Science, and in Communication as well. Both disciplines have made major advances in recent years, driven in part by work that leverages new 'big-data' techniques to explore the content and impact of social media. This series of panels aims to bring scholars in both fields together to discuss current research, and to consider the advantages of approaching social media using a combination of cross-disciplinary theories and 'big-data' methodologies.

The Paradox of Citizenship in America: Ideals and Reality by Mehnaaz Momen Palgrave Macmillan, 2017 <http://www.springer.com/gb/book/9783319615295#otherversion=9783319615301> This book addresses a range of issues that shape citizenship—political philosophy, historical connotations, transitions in the nation-state, methods of governance, legal provisions, and real-life implications—including its impact on different groups of people in terms of their ethnic, regional, and class positions. The evolution of American citizenship is explored through five different perspectives—identity, nation-building, world relations, immigration, and information technology—focusing on the official narratives as well as the real-life consequences, and most importantly, why and how the gaps between the two versions have been produced and maintained throughout history. While the meaning of citizenship in America has been analyzed from the multiple perspectives of history, politics, and policy, special attention has been paid to the critical junctures where rhetoric and reality clash, and how paradoxes occur which contain the nuanced and more complete story of citizenship.

The shocking election of President Trump spawned myriad analyses and post-mortems, but they consistently underestimate the crucial role of the Tea Party on the GOP and Republican House members specifically. In Reactionary Republicanism, Bryan T. Gervais and Irwin L. Morris develop the most sophisticated analysis to date for gauging the Tea Party's impact upon the U.S. House of Representatives. They employ multiple types of data to illustrate the multi-dimensional impact of the Tea Party movement on members of Congress. Contrary to conventional wisdom, they find that Republicans associated with the Tea Party movement were neither a small minority of the Republican conference nor intransigent backbenchers. Most importantly, the invigoration of racial hostility and social conservatism among Tea Party supporters fostered the growth of reactionary Republicanism. Tea Party legislators, in turn, endeavored to aggravate these feelings of resentment via digital home styles that incorporated uncivil and aversion-inducing rhetoric. Trump fed off of this during his run, and his symbiotic relationship with Tea Party regulars has guided-and seems destined to-the trajectory of his administration.

The American South has always had an outsized influence on national political development. The evil and brutality of African slavery in service of profit and wealth corrupted southern culture, which, in turn, corrupted American culture. Planters and farmers in the region had additional fears about a centralized government, even with the bonus three-fifths representation for human chattel gained at the Philadelphia Convention. As the southern political economy became more dependent on slave labor and the population and power of free states swelled, those fears led to war. In the aftermath of defeat, conservatives managed to secure white supremacy and a brutal racial hierarchy that was, for many years, ignored by the federal government. This tenuous arrangement set the stage for some of the great domestic dramas of the modern American state – desegregation, extension of rights to all citizens, party realignment, and the establishment of a truly national political, economic, and constitutional system. This panel considers the place of the South in American political development from a variety of perspectives.

This year's proposals contained an outstanding set of proposals using new data or new measurement techniques, some of which were on similar topics. Taking advantage of this synergy, I created a set of panels "Novel data, novel measures" to profile these new data or measurement methodologies, with the intention of turning them into workshops. In the spirit of advanced methods training, these panels are often smaller than the other panels to provide a chance for the researchers to emphasize not only the findings but also showcase the new data or measurement strategies, giving presenters and the audience a chance to learn from one another.

The cross-national study of political parties was once hampered by a lack of systematic party-level data, but in recent years the newly-available resources have radically changed this picture. This panel brings together scholars who have helped compile some of the leading new data sources for studying parties and party systems. They will discuss how these and other new sources can help advance studies in this field, and will consider some of the remaining challenges for future data collection in this area.

This book provides a comprehensive investigation of the political dimensions of civil religion in the United States. By employing an original social-psychological theory rooted in semiotics, it offers a qualitative and quantitative empirical examination of more than fifty years of political rhetoric. Further, it presents two in-depth case studies that examine how the cultural, totemic sign of 'the Founding Fathers' and the signs of America's sacred texts (the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence) are used in attempts to link partisan policy positions with notions that the country collectively holds sacred. The book's overarching thesis is that America's civil religion serves as a discursive framework for the country's politics of the sacred, mediating the demands of particularistic interests and social solidarity through the interaction of social belief and institutional politics like elections and the Supreme Court. The book penetrates America's unique political religiosity to reveal and unravel the intricate ways in which politics, political institutions, religion and culture intertwine in the United States. Since the 2011 uprisings, the Middle East and North Africa region has undergone dramatic changes. These changes include how the region's authoritarian regimes manage politics, fend off the opposition, and pursue policies to keep their citizens compliant. Similarly, dramatic changes have taken place amongst oppositionists—social movements, political parties, sectarian minorities, coup plotters, and other actors that challenge regimes. Many of these oppositionists have altered their strategies and tactics to enhance their effectiveness in voicing their demands, realizing their interests, and undermining regimes. Engaging this topic, this panel explores emerging trends in scholarship related to Middle East democratization and authoritarianism. Drawing on diverse methodologies, including qualitative interviews, original surveys, and archival research, this panel's papers present new theoretical findings related to this region's authoritarian regimes and the opposition movements that contest them. The panel's papers look not only at a variety of countries (Tunisia, Syria, Turkey, Egypt, and others) but also diverse chronological time periods—both contemporary and historical—to reveal emerging research trends in this domain of scholarly inquiry. The panel's first two papers look at the relationship between autocrats and their militaries in the Middle East. Utilizing an original dataset built from Tunisian Arabic archival documents, the first paper explores which elites are most likely to be entrusted by autocrats as security ministers (leaders of either the security services or military). The second paper examines the formation of Syria's military under the French mandate and the sectarian dynamics that were at play in the armed forces from the early years of its inception until the first decades that followed independence and the Assad regime's ascent to power. The panel's latter two papers look at opposition movements within authoritarian regimes of the Middle East. The third paper, drawing on an original survey experiment from Turkey, examines how an opposition leader's prison record (legacy of imprisonment) increases his public support among likely voters. The fourth paper looks at the relationship between digital communications technology and psychological cognitive processing, showing how it played an important role in shaping the patterns of mobilization among political actors and movements. Taken as a whole, this panel's papers carry critical consequences for research on democratization and authoritarian persistence, highlighting new avenues for future scholarship based in the Middle East context.

There are burgeoning literatures focused on social media and political behavior. This work focuses, for instance, on the nature of social media content, the structure of online social networks, the use of social media as tool to understand political behavior, and the impact that social media use and/or content has on a wide range of political attitudes and behaviors. Scholars are working on these themes in Political Science, and in Communication as well. Both disciplines have made major advances in recent years, driven in part by work that leverages new 'big-data' techniques to explore the content and impact of social media. This series of panels aims to bring scholars in both fields together to discuss current research, and to consider the advantages of approaching social media using a combination of cross-disciplinary theories and 'big-data' methodologies.

States vary in their capacity to govern and extract resources, both across their geography as well as across time. In recent years, interest in the origins of state capacity and the consequences of variation therein has grown. The ability of the state to raise revenue and rule its territory has important contemporaneous, downstream, and long-run effects on policies, institutions, as well as economic and political development. These, in turn, may affect incentives of politicians to strategically invest (or not) in state capacity in expectation of potential political consequences. The papers in this panel build on the most recent developments in the literature and investigate 1) how and why states differ in their levels of state capacity; and 2) how these differences in capacity effect political economic outcomes. Together, they inform our understanding of the endogeneity of state capacity – in other words, the strategic calculations that may undergird decisions to invest in the state. The proposed papers make use of econometrics, historical data, and mathematical modeling to investigate these questions. Larreguy, Rodríguez, and Talanquer argue that differing level of state capacity influence the state's response to social unrest and use data from historical Mexico to test their argument. Pavithra Suryarayan uses the case of India to contend that political elites may undermine the capacity of the state to raise revenue to protect themselves from future taxation should outside groups gain political power. Lee and Paine use game theory to investigate the reasons for Western European states' development into revenue raising machines in the early 20th century. Lastly, Gottlieb and Hollenbach ask whether different levels of fiscal capacity changes how voters evaluate politicians' efforts to increase taxes and make use of a quasi-exogenous shock to fiscal capacity in Brazilian municipalities to answer this question.

In THE GREAT BROADENING (forthcoming from the University of Chicago Press), we document the expansion of the national policy agenda and its effects on modern governance. Beginning in the mid-1950s, peaking in the late 1970s, and declining afterward, the United States experienced a vast expansion in the national policy-making agenda. We call this burst the Great Broadening because government got larger, not by doing more of what it was already doing but by getting involved in new issues. We suggest that the downstream effects of the expansion of the scope of the federal government in the late 1970s include, increases in polarization, the radical transformation of Congress from primarily a lawmaking body to primarily an oversight body, the proliferation of interest groups in Washington D.C. and the conservative counter-revolution. This panel will showcase the criticisms of this book's argument as well as the authors' response.

There are burgeoning literatures focused on social media and political behavior. This work focuses, for instance, on the nature of social media content, the structure of online social networks, the use of social media as tool to understand political behavior, and the impact that social media use and/or content has on a wide range of political attitudes and behaviors. Scholars are working on these themes in Political Science, and in Communication as well. Both disciplines have made major advances in recent years, driven in part by work that leverages new 'big-data' techniques to explore the content and impact of social media. This series of panels aims to bring scholars in both fields together to discuss current research, and to consider the advantages of approaching social media using a combination of cross-disciplinary theories and 'big-data' methodologies.

Teaching Political Science

As a tireless advocate for learners everywhere, Oregon State University is proactive in finding ways to make higher education more affordable, and its open textbook initiative aims to ease the financial strain on students. Slide comparing textbook costs and student success A collaboration between OSU Libraries, OSU Press and Ecampus Open Educational Resources, the open textbook initiative provides financial, technical and editorial support for faculty members to adapt, adopt or author texts that will be freely accessible online to any student in the world. Oregon State students will spend an average of $1,200 on textbooks and supplies in 2017-18, according to the Office of Financial Aid and Scholarships. That's on par with the national average as estimated by The College Board. In addition to relieving students of ever-increasing costs, these works will also feature interactive content that enhances learning through video, audio and other multimedia. The textbooks will be incorporated into OSU curriculum and include Creative Commons licenses to facilitate their use at other universities at no cost.

Author

Daniel Kapust, UW Madison

Professor Kapust's new book Flattery and the History of Political Thought: That Glib and Oily Art (Cambridge University Press, 2018) addresses the moral and political problems associated with flattery, as they have been explored in a wide range of ancient and early modern texts including Cicero, Pliny, Castiglione, Machiavelli, Hobbes, Mandeville, Smith, and the Federalists/Anti-Federalists. Arguing that flattery is not always the contemptible and low-minded behavior that it often seems to be, Kapust explores how it has been used to navigate serious power imbalances and even to realize our deepest social capacities. Discussing Kapust's book will be: Naomi Choi (Assistant Professor of Political Science at the University of Houston), Andrew Riggsby (Luce Shoe Meritt Professor of Classics at the University of Texas, Austin), and Daniel O'Neill (Associate Professor of Political Science at the University of Florida)

In his book The Human Rights State: Justice within and beyond Sovereign Nations Benjamin Gregg theorizes ways in which citizens can assert their rights in order to transform existing states into rights-respecting political orders, which he metaphorically calls a human rights state. One's status as a human being, rather than the territory one inhabits, should determine whether one bears at least a minimal set of rights. In his view, human rights are made and achieved, not discovered or given. They are best realized through persuasion from the local level on up by challenging, influencing, and modifying the resources of the state. This involves reimagining the rights-respecting state such that rights trump, and so limit, territorial sovereignty. The human rights state promotes justice by embodying locally sourced cosmopolitan rights, which are a socially constructed practice originating through voluntary participation. Yet, curiously, Gregg focuses on the rule of law rather than democracy as the major precondition for the possibility of human rights. He connects deep philosophical insight with the practical importance of advancing a more rights-respecting cosmopolitan order. As such, his book warrants on-going critical engagement to explore its central theoretical aspects, relevant interdisciplinary connections, and noteworthy empirical applications. I propose this roundtable, with the author, to provide a stimulating and worthwhile discussion among experts in the field.

Although most of the human being have historically and geographically lived under authoritarian rule, majority of the studies in political science have focused on politics in democratic countries. This conference-within-the-conference tries to fill this hole in political science. Why have some authoritarian regimes been resilient (like China so far)? What makes authoritarian governments stay in power? How do institutions help the regime to sustain authoritarian rule, if at all? How do authoritarian regimes face the challenges from popular protests and democratization movements? Interestingly, many authoritarian regimes have faced social unrest, and they have been democratized in some cases while they have survived in other cases. What explanations would account for this variation? And do authoritarian states behave differently in international relations? To answer these questions, the papers in the panels draw empirical evidence from politics in China, the Middle East, and other authoritarian countries. Panel 1 focuses on how rulers manage public opinion and popular participation to maintain the authoritarian regime, Panel 2 highlights the interactions between domestic politics and international relations in the authoritarian context, and Panel 3 explores the interactions between popular participation and foreign policy making in the context of China-U.S. relations.

Author meets critics for my recently published book, Undoing Work, Rethinking Community: A Critique of the Social Function of Work (Cornell University Press, 2018). From the back of the book: "This revolutionary book presents a new conception of community and the struggle against capitalism. In Undoing Work, Rethinking Community, James A. Chamberlain argues that paid work and the civic duty to perform it substantially undermines freedom and justice. Chamberlain believes that to seize back our time and transform our society, we must abandon the deep-seated view that community is constructed by work, whether paid or not."

The use of simulations in classrooms has received relatively consistent attention over the years and research demonstrates the benefits of using simulations in the classroom (Weir and Baranowski 2011; Bernstein and Meizlish 2003). In particular, the use of Model United Nations has set the standard for activities that create scenarios designed to simulate an international organization and engage students in more hands-on, high-impact experiential learning (Muldoon, 1995; Obendorf and Randerson, 2013). However, there has been a proliferation of simulations reflecting regional intergovernmental organizations, such as Model Arab League, Model Organization of American States, and Model NATO. Despite this proliferation, literature describing how to develop, participate in, and succeed at many of these regional model simulations is lacking. This panel will cover a variety of topics related to the Model Organization of American States simulation, including a review of tips and techniques for first-time teachers, specifics on parliamentary procedures and how to use them effectively, how to prepare for the crisis scenario, and finally, how to prepare for the Mock Inter-American Court of Human Rights simulation, which presents unique challenges different than domestic moot court simulations. This panel hopes to increase the use of regional organization simulations and to help professors find ways to prepare and succeed in using simulations in the classroom.

Although most of the human being have historically and geographically lived under authoritarian rule, majority of the studies in political science have focused on politics in democratic countries. This conference-within-the-conference tries to fill this hole in political science. Why have some authoritarian regimes been resilient (like China so far)? What makes authoritarian governments stay in power? How do institutions help the regime to sustain authoritarian rule, if at all? How do authoritarian regimes face the challenges from popular protests and democratization movements? Interestingly, many authoritarian regimes have faced social unrest, and they have been democratized in some cases while they have survived in other cases. What explanations would account for this variation? And do authoritarian states behave differently in international relations? To answer these questions, the papers in the panels draw empirical evidence from politics in China, the Middle East, and other authoritarian countries. Panel 1 focuses on how rulers manage public opinion and popular participation to maintain the authoritarian regime, Panel 2 highlights the interactions between domestic politics and international relations in the authoritarian context, and Panel 3 explores the interactions between popular participation and foreign policy making in the context of China-U.S. relations.

Professor Michelle Clarke's recently published "Machiavelli's Florentine Republic" (Cambridge University Press) is an important contribution to scholarship on Machiavelli and republicanism. Focusing on Machiavelli's "Florentine Histories," Professor Clarke argues provocatively that Machiavelli not only debunks the views of his humanist contemporaries and predecessors, but that he also shows that conventional morality is often a tool of ambitious rulers. Discussing Professor Clarke's book are three political theorists: Cary Nederman (Texas A and M), Alexander Duff (University of North Texas), and Rebecca Flavin (Baylor University).

“Politics, Race and America’s Enduring Dilemma: How the Politics of Public Education Maintains Racial Disparities

Theodore J. Davis, Jr., University of Delaware

The year 2019 represents the 400th anniversary of the arrival of the 20 Africans into Jamestown, Virginia - the first permanent English settlement in what will eventually become the United States. Not coincidentally, in 1619 – the same year that Africans were introduced into the new colony – the first representative assembly in the English colonies (the House of Burgesses) was established. These two parallel events would place the lives of the descendants of the English settlers and the Africans on fundamentally different trajectories. The English and other “whites” would become heirs to a constitutional republic, a grand experiment in human freedom, endowed with the rights to “life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.” The Africans, on the other hand, were reduced to chattel slavery and treated as three-fifths of a person by the Constitution of the United States. Slavery is often thought of as America’s “original sin” which, as David Brion Davis in The Problem of Slavery in Western Culture (1966) argues, calls into question “the very meaning of America.” Similarly, the French nobleman Alexis de Tocqueville, upon visiting the United States in the 1830’s, writes in Democracy in America that slavery “represents the greatest threat” to the future of the United States than any other factor. A century later, Swedish sociologist Gunnar Myrdal coined the term “The American Dilemma” to describe the chasm between America’s ideals of liberty and justice for all and its actual treatment of African Americans. Despite the tumultuous changes that the nation has experienced since its founding – the American Revolution, westward expansion, the Civil War and Reconstruction, the World Wars, the emergence of the United States as a superpower, the modern civil rights movement, or the election of the nation’s first African American president– race has remained remarkably resilient as a defining feature of American politics. Instead of leading America to a “postracial nirvana,” Barack Obama’s election inspired a racist, reactionary political backlash which ultimately culminated in the election of Donald J. Trump as president of the United States. This panel will discuss the stubbornly resilient relevancy of race in American politics. While this discussion is couched in the history of race relations in America, the bulk of this dialogue will concentrate on the significance of the fact that the same America that elected Barack Obama in 2008 and 2012 elected Donald Trump in 2016. Not coincidentally, Donald Trump first emerged as a serious presidential possibility when he became the national spokesman for the “birther movement” which asserted, without evidence, that Barack Obama was not a citizen of the United States. The fact that this roundtable will take place in the aftermath of the 2018 midterm elections and as the 2020 presidential

Although most of the human being have historically and geographically lived under authoritarian rule, majority of the studies in political science have focused on politics in democratic countries. This conference-within-the-conference tries to fill this hole in political science. Why have some authoritarian regimes been resilient (like China so far)? What makes authoritarian governments stay in power? How do institutions help the regime to sustain authoritarian rule, if at all? How do authoritarian regimes face the challenges from popular protests and democratization movements? Interestingly, many authoritarian regimes have faced social unrest, and they have been democratized in some cases while they have survived in other cases. What explanations would account for this variation? And do authoritarian states behave differently in international relations? To answer these questions, the papers in the panels draw empirical evidence from politics in China, the Middle East, and other authoritarian countries. Panel 1 focuses on how rulers manage public opinion and popular participation to maintain the authoritarian regime, Panel 2 highlights the interactions between domestic politics and international relations in the authoritarian context, and Panel 3 explores the interactions between popular participation and foreign policy making in the context of China-U.S. relations.

Authors Meet Critics: "Legacies of Losing in American Politics"Saturday

Nicole Mellow, Williams College

Described by renowned APD scholar and current APSA President, Rogers Smith, as “a riveting argument that may well prove seminal,” Legacies of Losing in American Politics (University of Chicago Press, 2018) is a provocative account of how three significant political losers in American history transformed themselves into long-term victors. Jeffrey Tulis and Nicole Mellow re-cast the massive defeats at the three most pivotal moments in American political history: the founding, when Anti-Federalists failed to stop the ratification of the Constitution; the aftermath of the Civil War, when President Andrew Johnson’s plan for restoring the South to the Union was defeated; and the 1964 presidential campaign, when Barry Goldwater’s challenge to the New Deal order was soundly defeated by Lyndon B. Johnson. In each of these cases, the very mechanisms that caused the initial failures facilitated the losers’ eventual successes, and the seemingly discredited ideas and programs disrupted political convention by prevailing, often subverting, and occasionally enhancing constitutional fidelity. In this author meets critic session, Tulis, Mellow, and a distinguished set of critics will discuss the book and its implications for the study of American political development, American political thought, and political science more generally. These implications include: problematizing the meaning of political success; offering a new conception of political agency; providing a new interpretation of Federalist and Anti-Federalist political thought; revising the idea of constitutional moments; elaborating the multiple traditions thesis; and providing a new account of the mechanisms that sustain illiberal ideas and practices. In addition to the authors (Tulis and Mellow), the panel will include the following critics: Chair: Thomas Bell, University of Texas at Austin; Panelists: David Crockett, Trinity University; Terri Davis, Lamar University; Curt Nichols, Baylor University

Roundtable Book Discussion: Renew Orleans? Globalized Development and Working Class Resistance (University of Minnesota Press, 2018). Hurricane Katrina hit the Gulf Coast a little more than one decade ago, with devastating impacts especially on the city of New Orleans. In what ways has the political economy of New Orleans shifted since the hurricane, and what do these shifts tell us about broader questions of development, politics, class and race in urban America? The recently published book, Renew Orleans? Globalized Development and Working Class Resistance, tackles these questions and analyzes the making of race and class in contemporary political struggles between elites committed to a globalized and exclusionary model of development and alternatives led by working class and popular forces. Drawing on original data collection, surveys, and interviews, Renew Orleans? explores the rise of a globally-oriented faction of local capital through the fragmented institutional architecture of local governance. These newly dominant elite factions used their power to impose a dual model of development, deregulating and re-regulating sectors in ways that enhance their control while ignoring greater linkages to the majority population of poor people of color. The book explores in specific details the segmentation of production in construction and tourism and services, in which people are allocated to good and bad jobs according to ascriptive characteristics of race, gender, and citizenship status. Such segmentation accelerates accumulation both in the workplace and in the community, and greatly complicates efforts to build working class power. Yet, episodes of resistance are frequent, occurring at the margins and the interstices of dominated sectors, and in historically-organized sectors such as manufacturing. The book identifies episodes of working class power, especially in the joined-up struggles that bridge resistance in the workplace to resistance in communities, joining struggles of production to struggles over social reproduction. But the book is realistic in noting the absence of any coherent political vehicle by which working classes might scale-up their resistance into the state and confront an increasingly-dominant globalized faction of the bourgeoisie. In the shadow of this recently published book and ongoing struggles in New Orleans and beyond, the proposed panel will address challenges facing cities with respect to development, politics, race, and class. Critics will reflect on Renew Orleans? and will provide their own comment on ongoing urban struggles, including those that extend struggles over production, social reproduction, class and race into political questions of power, political elites, and urban governance. Participants: Aaron Schneider, author of Renew Orleans? (University of Denver) Adolph Reed, Jr., author of Stirrings in the Jug: Black Politics in the Post-Segregation Era (University of Pennsylvania) Cedric Johnson, author of Revolutionaries to Race Leaders: Black Power and the Making of African American Politics (University of Illinois at Chicago) John (Jay) Arena, author of Driven from New Orleans: How Nonprofits Betray Public Housing and Promote Privatization (City University of New York – Staten Island)

Since the advent of industrialization, the promise of the American way of life has included technological modernization, widely shared economic prosperity, and the sense (though challenged by many factors) of national and social integrity. Taken together, these have formed the goal of the "social contract" between American workers and business owners, between "labor" and "capital." In the last thirty years the transformation of the American economy toward the production of services and the importation of manufactured goods (and increasingly high-technology manufactures) has strained this arrangement on all sides. The participants in our roundtable will address this question from a number of different angles: What should political theory make of the challenges to American liberalism (in all its forms) posed by the political reactions to this situation? Can those reactions retain the goods of liberalism and avoid the dangers of anti-liberalism? Can the American economy successfully navigate the waters of technological change and change in the makeup of the American labor force? What role will the state have to play, on a national and local level, in the next twenty to thirty years of American technological development? Does the existing American "social contract" have a future—how can it be changed to accommodate the next economy, and how can the country manage the development of that economy for the benefit of the nation as a whole?

Since at least the time of God and Man at Yale, conservatives have complained that the Academy has a liberal bias. Indeed, universities have been dominated by liberal professors and liberal students. Increasingly, universities are seen by conservatives as not only unfriendly to them, but also hostile to the public interest. The election of Donald Trump to the presidency disrupted the fairly stable ideological patterns and divisions between Republicans and Democrats, further heightening political polarization and increasing distrust and animosity within the electorate. What impacts has Trump's election had on the ideological dimensions of higher education? Of political science? Although ideology is a key concept of our discipline, one would scan the APSA website in vain to find insights into the ideology of our profession. This proposed roundtable hopes to remedy this by focusing on matters involving ideology — and especially ideological diversity — within the political science discipline. PS: Political Science and Politics has agreed to publish two symposia based on these issues in 2019. Those presenting at SPSA have all committed to writing essays for the symposia.

Popular perception holds that presidents act “first and alone,” resorting to unilateral orders to promote their agenda and head off unfavorable legislation. Little research, however, has considered the diverse circumstances in which such orders are issued. The Dual Executive: Unilateral Orders in a Separated and Shared Power System reinterprets how and when presidents use unilateral power by illuminating the dual roles of the president. Drawing from an original data set of over 5,000 executive orders and proclamations, this book situates unilateral orders within the broad scope of executive-legislative relations. Michelle Belco and Brandon Rottinghaus shed light on the shared nature of unilateral power by recasting the executive as both an aggressive “commander” and a cooperative “administrator” who uses unilateral power not only to circumvent Congress but also to support and facilitate its operations.

This panel addresses new perspectives on the capacities of government policies to impact sub-national and transnational institutions. While states are the key political agents in the global order, the ability to control the outputs and externalities of their policy choices varies widely as the panel highlights. The papers address the policy goals and unintended consequences of domestic, foreign, and comparative governance. The panel examines long-range considerations of global hegemony and global policy for addressing trade and counterterrorism; it also grapples with the impact of non-traditional security policies across state borders employing comparative perspectives. Embedded in the broader longitudinal waves that drive globalization, each paper deals with how macro-level considerations affect local considerations from human rights violations of the indigenous peoples of Indonesia to the exacerbation of sexism in the provision of social services in the US. Each of the authors writes from the perspective of a generation steeped in globalism and committed to understanding a sense of self, place, and a recognition that managing the realities of change so as to promote greater understanding is what gives each community a deeper awareness both of its own fragility and its motivation for self-expression and survival amidst post-modern globalization.

This panel would allow the author to present and listen to criticism on her book's findings regarding the effects of female role models (female officeholders) on another generation of women deciding to run for political office. In the current political environment (i.e. post Clinton's presidential nomination), more women are running for elective office. The author explores the influence of female political role models. Women possess political ambition, albeit to varying degrees, and as such, women seek opportunities to be politically engaged. "Women Officeholders and the Role Models Who Pioneered the Way" analyzes why American women run for political office and explores how political role models, identified as publicly elected officials, have greatly motivated women to run for higher political office. This book provides evidence from personal interviews with female members of Congress and state legislators as well as quantitative analysis of elections from the 1974 to 2010.

This authors meet critics panel will focus on Stella Rouse and Ashley Ross' book, "The Politics of Millennials: Political Beliefs and Policy Preferences of America's Most Diverse Generation" (Michigan Press 2018). The Politics of Millennials offers a first of its kind analysis of the Millennial Generation's political attitudes and policy preferences. The book utilizes data from multiple original surveys, as well as from extensive, original focus group interviews, to explore how the Millennial Generation identity or frame affects this cohort's political attitudes. The findings show that important and unique characteristics of the Millennial Generation significantly and substantively affect this cohort's political attitudes, policy preferences, and levels of political engagement, which have meaningful implications for the current and future U.S. political landscape. This is an important book that examines how the largest and most diverse generation in U.S. history will influence the political process and engages with the political system. The panel brings together scholars from different parts of the discipline to engage with the substantive themes of the book, with the goal of connecting those themes to a broader discussion about how we account for generation identity. The following scholars will participate: Bethany Albertson, University of Texas at Austin Elizabeth Oldmixon, University of North Texas Jason Casellas, University of Houston Each of the participants is excited about the book and what it will add to our study of political behavior, public opinion, and race and ethnic politics.

This panel brings together Nietzsche scholars to treat the themes of joy and cheerfulness and the way in which they inform his political thought. This includes consideration of the meaning of cheerfulness as an opening to new possibilities in light of the great historical changes Nietzsche anticipates, including considering the capacity for cheerfulness and invigorating new possibilities for human relations, political structures, and the reevaluation of values. Rather than remaining mired in debates about democracy and hierarchy, the papers on this panel consider the way in which joy contributes to his understanding of political change and the shape of future possibilities. The papers will all attend to the way in which such affirmative possibilities shape Nietzsche's contribution to political thought. Among the various themes examined, it takes up the meaning of cheerfulness after the death of God, joyful relationality, subversive laughter, aesthetic play, and disruptive overcoming. The linked essays will bring together high-level scholarship on Nietzsche's political thought that will engage one another on the way in which Nietzsche's thought may inform future possibilities for philosophy and political life.

The election of Donald Trump to the presidency disrupted the fairly stable ideological patterns and divisions between Republicans and Democrats, further heightening political polarization and increasing distrust and animosity within the electorate. How has the rising polarization and tribalism in America affected the teaching of political science? How have teachers handled issues of political ideology, given the diversity of opinions among both faculty and students? This roundtable is the second of two symposia to appear in 2019 in PS: Political Science and Politics. Fewer faculty in this symposium were able to attend SPSA, so I hope to add a few more speakers.

Workshop: Facilitating Classroom Interactions in an Era of Political PolarizationSaturday
5:00pm-6:20pmTeaching Political Science

This research in political science education explores how to facilitate productive in-class discussions of public policies during times of intense political polarization. Building on Mcavoy and Hess's (2013) study of classroom deliberation, we apply the psychological theory of "Interpersonal Group Therapy" (Yalom, 2008) to entry level political science courses. Following Yalom's model of "group therapy" where the job of the therapist is to make things uncomfortable in order to stimulate growth and wisdom, we theorize that it is occasionally the job of the instructor to facilitate uncomfortable classroom discussions in a manner that stimulates intellectual growth and wisdom. Our design utilizes a survey experiment that tracks students understanding of complex, controversial political issues over two semesters of entry level political science courses.

Two Steps Forward, One Step Back: Idolatry and Materialistic Monotheism in the Guide of the Perplexed

Seth Appelbaum, St. John's College, Santa Fe

At least since Shlomo Pines's 1979 article on the limits of knowledge in Maimonides, scholars have argued on all sides of the question with the majority of scholars accepting the notion that Maimonides in his Guide of the Perplexed makes some stark claims setting forth limits of knowledge. Yet scholars remain divided about whether he accepts clear limits and bows to Jewish tradition as to the proper view of God or harbors some other view of God, despite his clear defense of Jewish law. Must we be skeptical and defer to tradition, or does Maimonides mean to teach something else? Are the limits of knowledge limits in principle much like Kants—as Pines argued—or might Maimonides be appealing to limits that are not so much in principle as convenient for his defense of Judaism? The proposed participants for this panel do not necessarily agree in their answers to these questions, but they agree that they are well worth asking.
