New Directions in Historical Political Economy: From Economic Change to Preferences
The past decades have seen a vast expansion of work applying classic political economy models and techniques of analysis to historical events. This panel includes a set of cutting edge papers from this literature, drawn from a wide variety of chronological and geographical settings. Directly or indirectly, all the papers examine the effects of economic changes (technological change, trade expansion, drought, the overall expansion of the 20th century Indian economy) on political preferences. All use original, often quite extensive projects of data collection. Dasgupta’s paper examines why rural voters support conservative parties despite low income levels that should dictate support for redistribution. Drawing on a historical natural experiment in the American great plains, it traces the “conservative turn” in rural America to a mid-20th century technological revolution in agriculture: the introduction of new irrigation technologies, notably center-pivot-irrigation, which made it much easier to profitably irrigate crops on a large scale with groundwater. It provides evidence that counties with aquifers became systematically more conservative in elections following the introduction of the new irrigation technology, due to the consolidation of large-scale farms based on water-intensive crops. In these areas, the rise of concentrated agribusiness interests played a critical role in tilting elections in a conservative direction. The findings highlight how biased technological change, by activating special interests, can play a disruptive role in politics. Fresh’s paper considers the political consequences of the dramatic expansion of British overseas trade beginning in the late 16th century brought about by the discovery of new ocean shipping routes to Asia and the Americas. Using an original individual-level dataset on the characteristics of Members of Parliament in England and Wales spanning two centuries (1550-1750), it examines the differential effect of an aggregate trend in expanding trade for constituencies more (as compared to less) directly connected to the expanding commercial economy. It finds that trade increased electoral contests and may have led the commercial interest to be more represented in parliament, but little evidence that expanding trade fundamentally empowered new societal groups on other dimensions — dynastic and aristocratic MPs, two markers of the traditional elite, were unaffected by the change. Together these findings suggest conditions under which economic change produces a transformation in the political elite. Lee’s paper takes a critical approach to the historical political economy literature. This literature is frequently characterized by highly aggregated units of analysis, a tight focus on a single intervention and a elision of events and conditions between the intervention and the measurement of the outcome. This paper analyses variation in the incidence of a wide variety of historical institutions and economic trends — colonial, precolonial, and postcolonial — at the village level within a single Indian district, using a complete panel dataset of village-level public goods provision over the 1871-2011 period, and additional data on precolonial and colonial landholding and land tenure arrangements and contemporary voting. While it finds that there are many correlations between historical institutions, the land tenure system, and contemporary voting and public goods, the historical interventions are so correlated with each other as to make causal inference difficult. The results indicate the obstacles to modeling the outcomes of complicated and interdependent historical processes. Sellers and Garfias examine the complementary roles of state weakness, elite divisions, and popular grievances on rebellion. They argue that state-building efforts increase division between local and national elites, which undermines provincial peacekeeping efforts and provides an opening for popular rebellion. For a given level of grievance, revolts from below are therefore more likely to be attempted and more likely to spread in areas where local elites harbor grievances over earlier state-building efforts. They provide support for the theory using subnational data on rebellion, tax centralization, and drought from the late 17th-century to the Mexican War of Independence. We show that droughts led to peasant uprisings throughout the late colonial period, but it was not until the weakening of national institutions following the fall of the Bourbon dynasty in 1808 that these uprisings grew into a large-scale insurgency. Insurgent mobilization during the Independence War was more likely in drought-affected areas that had higher exposure to the Bourbon centralization of tax collection, which reduced the rents available to the local elite and thus elite loyalty to the government.

Although most of the human being have historically and geographically lived under authoritarian rule, majority of the studies in political science have focused on politics in democratic countries. This conference-within-the-conference tries to fill this hole in political science. Why have some authoritarian regimes been resilient (like China so far)? What makes authoritarian governments stay in power? How do institutions help the regime to sustain authoritarian rule, if at all? How do authoritarian regimes face the challenges from popular protests and democratization movements? Interestingly, many authoritarian regimes have faced social unrest, and they have been democratized in some cases while they have survived in other cases. What explanations would account for this variation? And do authoritarian states behave differently in international relations? To answer these questions, the papers in the panels draw empirical evidence from politics in China, the Middle East, and other authoritarian countries. Panel 1 focuses on how rulers manage public opinion and popular participation to maintain the authoritarian regime, Panel 2 discusses political behavior regarding ideology and refugees in the authoritarian context, and Panel 3 explores authoritarian institutional politics in the context of elite politics, international relations, and state-society relations.

This panel examines how disasters shock the political system in ways that shape subsequent policy. Two of the studies presented explore this in the context of climate change mitigation. The first study leverages Hurricane Sandy and Hurricane Matthew as natural experiments to examine belief in climate change and support for federal mitigation. The second study uses time series data to identify the effect of exposure to climate impacts on risk perceptions and policy preferences about climate change. The third study of the panel pivots to another policy area – education – and investigates shifts in educational priorities in the post-disaster environment. The findings of these studies contribute to our understanding of the impact of natural disasters on the policy process, from agenda-setting to implementation.

Where is the Party?: Explaining Political Party Shifts on Attitudes towards LGBT Rights in Europe
Scott Siegel, San Francisco State University
Brian Olinger, San Francisco State University

Fifty years since the Stonewall Riot, remarkable progress has happened in expanding legal protections and equal treatment laws for members of the LGBT in many advanced democracies. Actors outside legislatures’ walls, such as social movements, interest groups, or just shifts in public opinion, are important factors that account for such rapid change. Yet, actors inside legislative bodies have also played crucial roles in advancing minority rights. Through descriptive representation, new legislative members from minority communities can influence or persuade lawmakers or shape the policy agenda. Yet, we know little about why descriptive representation works, under what conditions, and if its effects are equally effective across different national and institutional contexts. While we often see a correlation between increased descriptive representation and progressive policy output, we know less about the mechanisms by which it occurs. The papers in this panel address this gap by exploring different dimensions of the power of descriptive representation. First, we examine what factors affect the chances of LGBT minorities enter legislative institutions by winning at election time. Second, we explore how descriptive representation affects the policy process when minorities become co-legislators. The final paper tracks whether descriptive representation changes the policy positions of major parties and members of parliament over time on LGBT rights, even when democratic majorities in their constituencies oppose them. The papers in this panel utilize diverse methods, types of information, and leverage the power of comparative analysis to yield significant results for how and when descriptive representation matters. As a result, they make substantive contributions to various literatures in the fields of public opinion, party politics, and gender and identity politics.

Discussant
Francisco I Pedraza, University of California, Riverside

This panel will take up two of the most pressing electoral issues which impact representation and voter participation, from the perspective of legal theory and empirical social science research: (1) how the 2020 Census counts people and apportions the population, and (2) the impact of voter ID laws on voter turnout and election results. Rather than a traditional conference panel, we propose to bring together leading social scientists who authored expert reports in federal lawsuits, paired with civil rights attorneys who tried the lawsuits. Social scientists will explain the empirical research in their export report, and lawyers from each case will present their legal theory and how and why they used social science data to advance their arguments. In addition, the panel will include discussants who have participated in voting rights lawsuits and can offer a unique perspective into both the social science and legal presentations.

This panel explores how contemporary technological developments affect strategic decisions between actors, and what these developments mean for conflict and cooperation. The papers below utilize a range of formal frameworks – including crisis bargaining models, principal-agent models and brinkmanship models – to examine how developments in cyberwarfare, precision guided munitions, international arms transfers, and states’ coercive capabilities shape both international and intrastate conflict.

This panel addresses numerous socio-political conflicts that are of profound importance to the academy and policymakers. While the panelists identify some key issues of governance, specific to each region, their theoretical frameworks provide analytical leverage in understanding these case studies through a comparative lens. Mclyn Williams offers a nuanced understanding of formal and informal corrupt institutions in Liberia. Her study found that a central factor in determining the outcome of criminal cases stemmed from the educational pedigree of the presiding jurist. Chelsea Riley asks: do donor nations possess useful leverage in changing human rights conditions of aid recipient nations? Her study found much is known about what makes aid ineffective, however, little is known about the relationship between foreign aid and human rights improvements vis-à-vis the Human Development Index. Another profound problem facing governments in the Middle East stems from the political power non-state terrorist organizations possess. In recent years, the rise of non-state armed groups in the region has given the U.S. pause. Janna Bourdonnay unpacks the politico-economic influence of al-Qaeda in the Middle East. Brendan Dunlap investigates Iran’s responsibility in fomenting domestic and international conflicts in the region. Dunlap assesses the US and Iran’s grand strategy apropos regional hegemonic competition. Finally, Sierra Harbert undertakes a nuanced and revelatory study of the immediate and long-term impacts European colonialism had on post-colonial armed conflicts in sub-Saharan Africa. Harbert finds armed conflict onset is often a result of the type of colonial governance, whether decolonization occurred peacefully or not, and the extent of influence the former metropole maintained over newly independent states. Altogether, the panelists promote a dialogue across various topics that address highly relevant socio-political issues in governance, human rights, and conflict today.

Although most of the human being have historically and geographically lived under authoritarian rule, majority of the studies in political science have focused on politics in democratic countries. This conference-within-the-conference tries to fill this hole in political science. Why have some authoritarian regimes been resilient (like China so far)? What makes authoritarian governments stay in power? How do institutions help the regime to sustain authoritarian rule, if at all? How do authoritarian regimes face the challenges from popular protests and democratization movements? Interestingly, many authoritarian regimes have faced social unrest, and they have been democratized in some cases while they have survived in other cases. What explanations would account for this variation? And do authoritarian states behave differently in international relations? To answer these questions, the papers in the panels draw empirical evidence from politics in China, the Middle East, and other authoritarian countries. Panel 1 focuses on how rulers manage public opinion and popular participation to maintain the authoritarian regime, Panel 2 discusses political behavior regarding ideology and refugees in the authoritarian context, and Panel 3 explores authoritarian institutional politics in the context of elite politics, international relations, and state-society relations.

This panel explores how disasters and democratic political institutions influence one another. Specifically, the institutions of representation and federalism are empirically examined. Presenters consider how: long-term drought shapes vote choice and elections; committee leadership that oversees Federal Emergency Management Agency funds influences state disaster payments; individuals attribute responsibility for disasters across federal institutions; and how the institutional status of Puerto Rico constrained disaster response and recovery coordination with local and federal governments. This research has implications for better understanding how disasters, democratic politics, and federal institutions create disparate sociopolitical outcomes.

Drawing insight from the political, economic, and legal spheres, this Roundtable examines possible pathways for Cuba and the US as identified in the book "The Cuba-US Bilateral Relationship: New Pathways and Policy Choices" (2019, Oxford University Press). Key among the issues to be discussed are unresoled property claims dating back to the 1959 revolution, establishing regularized bilateral economic relationships given challenges from China and European countries, the ongoing influence of Helms-Burton, environmental concerns, as well as leadership turnover at the highest levels in both Cuba and the United States. This Roundtable tackles these issues by positing viable policy choices as the bilateral relationship lurches forward in an unpredictable political environment.

Although most of the human being have historically and geographically lived under authoritarian rule, majority of the studies in political science have focused on politics in democratic countries. This conference-within-the-conference tries to fill this hole in political science. Why have some authoritarian regimes been resilient (like China so far)? What makes authoritarian governments stay in power? How do institutions help the regime to sustain authoritarian rule, if at all? How do authoritarian regimes face the challenges from popular protests and democratization movements? Interestingly, many authoritarian regimes have faced social unrest, and they have been democratized in some cases while they have survived in other cases. What explanations would account for this variation? And do authoritarian states behave differently in international relations? To answer these questions, the papers in the panels draw empirical evidence from politics in China, the Middle East, and other authoritarian countries. Panel 1 focuses on how rulers manage public opinion and popular participation to maintain the authoritarian regime, Panel 2 discusses political behavior regarding ideology and refugees in the authoritarian context, and Panel 3 explores authoritarian institutional politics in the context of elite politics, international relations, and state-society relations.

It is widely accepted that disasters are social responses to disturbances. The social dynamics of disasters, therefore, are critical to understand. This panel explores a diverse set of social dynamics in relation to natural and sociopolitical disasters. One study examines food as a function of social support and demonstrates that it decreases stress in a post-disaster environment. Another investigates the relationship between ethnic diversity and cooperation in the post-disaster environment, finding that ethnic segregation is associated with more disaster assistance while ethnically diverse communities report lower cooperation. A third study assesses how social capital (bonding, bridging, and linking) facilitated recovery efforts and enhanced resilience in two rural communities where government capacity was lacking, and the final study examines the impact of variation in social trust (horizontal and vertical) on resilience. Taken together, these studies advance our understanding of how social institutions and relationships affect disaster resilience.

This panel discusses The Congressional Endgame: Interchamber Bargaining and Compromise, by Josh M. Ryan. The book offers a theory of how bicameral bargaining works and the types of policy outcomes produced. Using data on recent congressional legislation and an array of empirical tests, the book explains how the chambers seek agreement, why failure at the resolution stage is so rare, and what types of legislation are likely to emerge from negotiations.

Scholars of race and politics have long studied the concept of group consciousness. Three papers on this panel extend that body of literature by asking how linked fate applies to the context of health, in-group giving, and attitudes toward immigrants. Focusing on colorism and intersectionality, the remaining two papers attempt to further blur the boundaries of linked fate by questioning how additional variables shape connectedness to racial groups.

Building on the premise that innovation and improvisation are critical components of disaster resilience, this panel explores how bureaucratic entrepreneurship and emergent groups contribute to response and recovery. The first study presented explores the tension between government-driven and entrepreneurial actions and the incentives bureaucrats face in a post-disaster context. The second study examines the role of emergent groups, such as the Cajun Navy, have in disaster response. The final study assesses the capacity of one type of emergent group – faith-based organizations – in terms of their own preparedness for disasters and the connections they maintain with formal and informal organizations. Collectively, these studies have implications for improving disaster preparedness and planning, particularly plans connecting public and private groups.

From Fragile to Agile: A Systems Approach to Resilience
Shayle Nelson Sabo, Larimer County Office of Emergency Management

Disaster preparedness has had a dominant place in the scholarship and practice of emergency management. However, there remains considerable room for improvement in the way we understand the concept of preparedness and how we translate this to practice. The first study of this panel identifies, through an uncommon machine learning technique, the factors most central to individual emergency preparedness. The second examines Youth Preparedness Councils that promote Community Emergency Response Team training for teens, and the third assesses how budgetary and decision-making institutions affect preparedness performance for institutions of higher education. The final study moves beyond the traditional approach of emergency management that prepares for known hazards and instead offers a framework focused on agile systems and processes to better respond, recover and adapt to complex (and unknown) hazards. Collectively, these studies offer advances in conceptualizing, measuring, and applying disaster preparedness.

Voters within democracies play a significant role in politics, but what do we need to know about them to understand their decision-making process? Since we live in a post-truth era, the relationships between voters and institutions are changing as old and new institutions evolve and conflict. Information cues become more diverse, interests change, and extremist groups rise. Thus, the panel seeks to answer this question by exploring the underlying mechanisms of electoral decision-making processes in democratic elections, the effects of institutions on voters, and the subsequent micro- and macro-level consequences. The papers in this panel aim at a deeper understanding of the process associated with voters adopting certain behaviors from a comparative perspective by examining variations in information cues, the effects behind the rise of extremist parties on political interest, and effects of governing party behavior on the likelihood of extremist party formation among voters.

During the summer of 2019, Puerto Rico witnessed a wave of non-stop protests which lasted several weeks. These protests emerged after a series of political scandals which smeared the administration of the Governor Ricardo Rosselló. The protests resulted in the resignation of Rosselló and several members of his executive cabinet. What were the structural and immediate causes of these historical protests? How did the lackluster recovery from hurricane Maria and the austerity policy imposed by the Fiscal Control Board fuel these protests? What were the demands? Which were the key actors in framing the public opinion? How did they use social media to mobilize people offline?

This panel fills important gaps in disaster research. The first two studies explore hazards largely neglected – heat waves and techna hazards (i.e., natural disasters triggered by technology). Heat waves have not received the attention of other disasters, including connections to agenda setting policy research; however, they are the natural disaster with the highest death toll. The first study outlines a research agenda for this hazard type, connecting it to existing theories and research on disaster policy. Little is also known about how individuals perceive techna hazards and the information sources they rely upon to appraise its risks. The second study assesses information source preferences for earthquakes using an original survey. The final study fills a gap left by the predominant focus of scholarly and social attention on urban areas. This study uses original survey data to identify the capital assets that are most critical in promoting disaster resilience in rural communities.

The central problem of “policing” is how to balance police and government authorities’ efforts to provide security to residents while safeguarding an individual’s rights and liberties. This panel addresses questions related to policing, domestic and international migration, and human rights. Jasmine Parker explores the intentional and subconscious tactics used by police in the U.S. to extract confessions and ultimately secure convictions. She offers an insightful take on action research that exposes the problem of bias-motivated profiling. Mykaela Brown’s “Jim Crow Never Left” examines the often unnoticed practice of “redlining,” a practice that marks so-called risky neighborhoods red, thus denying residents access to essential services. Her study shows the negative impacts redlining has on majority minority neighborhoods in the U.S. Stephens Preston investigates the economic, political and social impacts of campaigns to raise the minimum wage. Jordan Moore continues our discussion of economic progress with her study of economic inequality in Latin America. She unpacks the multifaceted problem of socioeconomic inequalities in Latin America and offers policy recommendations for their improvement. Gabrielle Szymanski leads our panel’s shift toward the international dimension of policing and security with her comparison of the U.S. and the Philippines’ “War on Drugs” programs. She offers a new approach that adopts health-driven factors to stabilize drug-use. Maddie Bercher explores the link between the European asylum crisis and the growth of Eurosepticism. Bercher qualitatively tests three common hypotheses against the rise of Eurosepticism and provides important takeaways for the American context. Finally, Taylor Murray studies the connection between American foreign policy and the migrant crisis. Taken together, this panels presents an interesting take on policing, migration and human rights issues in the Western and European contexts.

Ranked choice voting (RCV) is an electoral reform that appears to be gaining popularity in U.S. elections. RCV allows voters to rank candidates by order of preference, and it is designed to ensure that the ultimate winner of a contest receives a majority of the vote. Over a dozen cities in the U.S., such as Minneapolis and San Francisco, have adopted RCV systems for local elections. In 2018, Maine was the first state to adopt RCV for some statewide and federal elections. A growing number of political observers suggest that RCV can remedy problematic elements of American politics such as excessive partisanship, negative campaigning, institutional barriers to voter choice, lack of majority rule. How does RCV measure up in practice? This panel will present some of the burgeoning research on RCV electoral systems in the United States. Specifically, panelists will present research that addresses how local election authorities in Maine feel about implementing RCV, how Maine political elites and ordinary voters assess the experience of RCV in relation to ambitious claims made by its proponents.

How might intersecting identities shape policy opinions and evaluations of political candidates? The first three papers assess the political implications of hurricanes via attitudes about climate change, the prevalence of domestic violence, and connections between race and institutional responsiveness to these disasters. The last two papers focus on different aspects of health by investigating the effects of risky behavior on young minority adults and the ways in which gender and body weight shape evaluations of candidates.

Since the SPSA last met in San Juan, in 2016, the island’s politics, and federal policy, have focused on several high-profile developments. These include, but are not limited to, the activities of a federal oversight board that monitors the island’s finances; litigation at the U.S. Supreme Court; and a movement on the island to reexamine governance in the wake of a gubernatorial resignation. Events in the other four major U.S. territories of American Samoa, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, Guam, and the U.S. Virgin Islands have been comparatively quiet, but are still a fundamental part of both the American political process and their own unique cultural and governmental environments. Nonetheless, the territories remain an afterthought in most aspects of modern political science and related disciplines. This roundtable discussion will explore how political science and related disciplines have studied politics in U.S. territories and what opportunities exist for future inquiry—and how recent political and policy developments have affected what might be a resurgence in scholarly interest in the topic. Panelists will discuss their recent research and policy developments. All those interested in learning more about U.S. territories, whether expert or beginner, are welcome to attend.

Can fiction be an effective tool for teaching political science? This “authors-meet-critics” panel brings together American, Comparative, and International Relations scholars to discuss the new book by Amy L. Atchison and Shauna L. Shames: Survive and Resist: The Definitive Guide to Dystopian Politics (Columbia University Press, 2019). In this book, the authors use dystopian fiction to help readers make sense of the political world, explaining not just the hallmarks of terrible governments (authoritarian and not) but also the ways that citizens can resist those governments, either individually or through social movements. Survive and Resist can be used to supplement a traditional introductory political science textbook, or it could be used as a foundation to structure a political science concepts course, leveraging the popularity of dystopian novels and film as a way to understand key concepts about the state and governance. The authors include topics ranging from political theory to regime types, and from non-violent resistance to political economy. On this authors-meet-critics panel, we hope to further the discussion of how fiction can be an effective tool for teaching political science and engaging students as well as the pedagogical pros and cons of the approach.

The papers on this panel explore immigration and asylum policies in host countries around the world. Andrew Rosenberg provides evidence of racial inequality in the migration policies of western states despite claims of being colorblind. Christopher Blair and his co-authors use a new dataset to examine the factors that influence asylum policies in developing countries, which have received less attention in the literature. Luisa Feline Freier De Ferrari explores why conservative governments in Latin America have been more welcoming toward Venezuelan refugees and migrants than their left-leaning counterparts. Finally, Elizabeth Iams Wellman considers how South Africa’s asylum policies have influenced the mobilization of Zimbabwean migrants.

This CWC brings together scholars from diverse backgrounds to examine questions relating to how courts interact with litigants, incumbents, and the public. Organized by Amanda Driscoll (FSU) and Michael Nelson (PSU). This round table convenes to discuss the case selection and instrument design of the first cross-national public opinion survey fielded in more than a quarter century.

The first African American female mayors won offices in 1973. On April 3, 1973, Lelia Foley, a poor, divorced, single mother, became mayor of predominantly black Taft, Oklahoma, a small town with approximately 600 residents. Later that year, Doris A. Davis, became the first black female mayor of a major metropolitan city after winning the mayoralty in Compton, California. Since 2002, ten black women have been elected as mayors of large cities. The year 2017 has been referred to as the “Year of the Black Woman Mayor” because five black women held office in major American cities simultaneously from January to June 2017. This was the largest number of black female mayors to serve in cities with populations of 300,000 at the same time in any period of American history. Also in 2017, a record number of black women (25) held mayoral offices in cities nationwide.

The papers on this panel consider decisions and actions taken by refugees and migrants themselves across various regions. Drawing on a unique survey of Syrian refugees, Rana Khoury examines how humanitarian aid influences political activism among civilians. Also based on fieldwork among Syrian refugees, Tiffany Chu looks at factors influencing refugees’ decisions to return to their home country. Stephanie Schwartz examines return and repeat displacement among refugees in central Africa. In the Latin American context, Jesse Acevedo considers how migration pressures vary based on class and other factors.

This panel analyzes women’s leadership in office as chief executives. Papers engage in cross-national analysis rather than rely on a single case study. Authors examine the gendered nature and consequences of the institutional context including political parties, the party system, governmental arrangements (formal structure and rules), and leadership norms and expectations (informal). Each paper employs some form of feminist institutional analysis (sociological, historical, discursive, and/or rational choice).

Black women are an important component of the American political system and many have made unprecedented impacts across the United States in the past 50 years. There is an absence of research surrounding the remarkable work of Black women in American politics, their influence on communities of color, and their impact on American history. This set of papers examines the impact of Black women elected officials.

This roundtable will explore important dynamics in the 2020 presidential contest based on lessons learned in key 2018 congressional campaigns. The participants all contributed chapters to a new book on the 2018 election cycle -- Cases in Congressional Campaigns: Split Decision. Each chapter, while covering the ins and outs of the campaign in the district or state, also addressed some common questions and elements. The roundtable will focus on a few of these, as they are important for not only understanding the results of the 2018 elections but will likely have a major impact on who is elected president in 2020. The roundtable discussion will focus on topics from the 2018 elections that inform 2020, including: · the impact of President Trump, his agenda, etc.; · issues that drove the individual campaigns; · strategies and tactics in the campaigns (i.e., key groups to candidates' winning coalitions, etc.); and · an analysis of the factors to determine why the winning candidate came out on top. The participants will be: Randall E. Adkins, University of Nebraska, Omaha, co-editor Gar Culbert, California State University, LA, California's 48th congressional district David A. Dulio and John S. Klemanski, Oakland University, Michigan's 11th congressional district Kim Fridkin and Patrick J. Presidents in modern democracies are concerned with bureaucratic responsiveness since, increasingly, key policy decisions are made by administrative rather than legislative actors. The primary way that presidents influence administrative policymaking is through the selection of political appointees to fill top executive branch positions. This panel explores the efforts of new presidents to secure control or cooperation from the continuing professional government, particularly through the use of political appointments.

Between 1995 and 2005, Latinos made up 8.6% of all political science undergraduate students in the U.S. but only 4.1% of Ph.D. recipients. The overall attrition rate in doctoral programs is close to 50%, and this rate is significantly higher among students from underrepresented backgrounds. Research shows that minority students face a number of challenges, including lack of funding, limited mentorship, fewer opportunities for collaboration and co-authorship, and less social support. Furthermore, undergraduates in Minority Serving Institutions (MSIs) must deal with the decline of state funding for their institutions and the impact that budget cuts have on counseling services, faculty hiring, and research activities. This additional burden makes it more difficult for minority students to gain exposure to political science research and mentorship, and for them to consider graduate school. This roundtable will bring together a group of experts to discuss the factors that underlie the dwindling rates of application, admission, and retention of minority students in political science graduate programs. The goal of this conversation is to provide specific recommendations based on insights learned from successful programs, such as the University of Puerto Rico’s Honors Program (PREH), the Ralph Bunche Summer Institute (RBSI) and the recently created Minority Graduate Placement Program (MIGAP). These programs are designed to help students engage in research, meet potential mentors in their field of interest, build a network of supportive peers, and navigate the graduate school application process. Finally, the roundtable will discuss existing and potential partnerships between MSIs and R1s that will support these goals. Confirmed participants include: Mayra Vélez-Serrano and Luis Cámara from the University of Puerto Rico; Fernando Tormos-Aponte from the University of Maryland, Baltimore County; Rob Mickey and Mara Ostfeld from the University of Michigan; Danielle Lemi from Michigan State University; and D’Andra Orey from Jackson State University.

This panel argues that policy programs need to be reevaluated to conform to shifting cultural norms. It serves as a call to action for policymakers to address ineffective policy structures that are currently exacerbating the social issues for which they were designed to resolve. Each panelist presents a novel approach to argue why existing policies are not effective in seeking to redress past inequalities. The papers find that not only are present policy efforts not beneficial to those who they are intended to help, but in fact, they are serving to construct institutional settings that reinforce normative biases that undermine any hope for improving the lives of the people who are at the greatest risk of suffering. The common element to each of these critiques is that cultural norms have shifted over time, so that a policy once thought to be advantageous to a particular marginalized group has become harmful in the light of a new framework for understanding the complexities of each issue. Since present policy regimes were put into place to ameliorate the conditions of these groups, the panel presents a set of counterfactuals that may be of discomfort to well-intentioned policymakers. Papers presented will address issues of sex workers in Northern Europe, gender-based violence in Latin America, ingrained inequalities in political opportunities for women, a need for grassroots engagement to fight climate change, and sustainable food security systems. Identifying embedded injustices within each of their respective policy regimes, the papers find it prudent to call upon a need for renewed energies for action, particularly among the millennial generation for greater engaged activism. The panel proposes a re-evaluation of existing mechanisms for promoting agency by questioning the effectiveness of present policy issues in context, offering new perspectives on meaningful improvement, and demanding more from the stakeholders of the future.

The papers on this panel use experimental methods to explore different aspects of borders and migration. Using experimental evidence, Michael Kenwick examines how anxieties about border control affect attitudes toward democratic norms about civil-military relations. Also in the United States, John Andrew Doces and Beth Elise Whitaker look at how support for deportation is influenced by an immigrant’s past service in the military and age at entry to the country. Turning to an international context, Alex Braithwaite and Tiffany Chu report the results of several experiments among Syrian refugees on decisions to flee, resettle, or return home.

This panel entails a consideration of questions about political freedom raised by literary figures that have contributed to political theory. Through an examination of a series of authors ranging from Machiavelli to Camus, it will ask about the way that love and imagination provide an alternative to the orders of political design, challenge the adequacy of that order, and can be reconciled with the needs of political order and freedom. What do these literary essays and works of fiction show about the adequacy of liberalism, constitutional politics, and political freedom? What place does tragedy play in modern life and to what extent does it challenge the place of justice as a central theoretical concern and stability as a central practical concern? It includes papers on Machiavelli, Shakespeare, Stendhal, Melville, Faulkner, and Camus, each by established scholars in Political Science, many of whom have done extensive work on the subjects of these papers and have offered professional contributions and publications in the subfield of Politics and Literature. Papers address such themes as levity as an alternative to political gravity, the political re-direction of eros, the value of liberal freedom, the role of imagination in constitutional politics, and the place of tragedy in modern political orders. Examination of these authors and the conversation among them demonstrates the contribution that serious consideration of literature can make to central questions of political theory about justice, community, legitimacy, and authority.

The papers on this panel explore the ramifications of racially motivated violence. With rich qualitative and quantitative analyses, authors on this panel examine racial abjection, the relationship between President Trump’s tweets and hate crimes, the ways in which racial violence builds social networks and shapes political participation, sexual assault on college campuses, and the lingering effects of institutional racism on Black mortality.

The papers on this panel examine different aspects of borders and migration in North and Central America, including migration from Puerto Rico (the location of this conference) to the mainland United States. Michael Paarlberg explores the issue of Central American gangs through a transnational lens. Katrina Burgess analyzes the effects of U.S. policies on asylum seekers in Mexico. Jaime Lluch examines the identity implications of borders by comparing Puerto Ricans on the island to those in the mainland United States. Finally, Jason Giersch and Beth Elise Whitaker look at how information about Puerto Rican migration after Hurricane Maria influenced Americans’ support for humanitarian relief.

Turning away from the partisan narratives of everyday politics, Constitutional Dysfunction on Trial uses five decades of congressional lawsuits as a diagnostic lens on separation of powers pathologies. Lawsuits are an outlet for frustrated members of both parties across a variety of policy and political landscapes, but they can backfire – leaving Congress as an institution even more disadvantaged. Analyzing legal challenges to presidential power at home and abroad, among other topics, the book argues these suits are better understood as symptoms of constitutional dysfunction than the cure. Fifty years of congressional atrophy cannot be reversed in court.

Few would deny that the Trump Presidency is “different.” Donald Trump brings no public service experience to the office, having dedicated his life to real estate and reality television, his campaign was unprecedented for the style of its rhetoric, a campaign being heavily investigated for possible foreign interference, his early appointments invoked protests rarely seen before, he lost the popular vote by a wide margin and registered among the lowest approval ratings in history in the early days of his presidency, his trade, immigration, and energy policies are deeply divisive, his numerous firings raise questions about the basic stability of his administration, and his use of tweets and the rhetoric of his foreign policy pronouncements have at best raised character questions. In an interview in the Oval Office in the days leading up to his first 100 days he himself announced that his was a “different kind of presidency.” Scholars will be studying and debating what all of this means for years to come. The purpose of our proposed panel is to consider whether and to what extent the Trump presidency is symbolic of a larger decay in American political culture that extends well beyond the institution of the presidency, a decay that is reflected in how political scientists have conceptualized, written about, published and taught the foundations of American constitutionalism and the dynamics of American political culture. Our working hypothesis is that it is not unreasonable to speak of an emerging “Trump Era” in American politics. More specifically, we ask the question: what would some of the best minds in American and European 19th and 20th century thought say today were they still with us? In particular, how might Hannah Arendt frame the issues surrounding immigration, citizenship, stateless, or quasi-stateless persons, and America’s relationship with Israel today? This will be addressed in a paper by Jennifer Morrow and Renee Phetsopha. How might Margaret Fuller see the gender issue and gender relations generally? Aubri Thurmond will tackle this by focusing on “woman” in the 21st century. How might a “true conservative” such as Russell Kirk assess the Trump Era? Sarah Armor is eager to contribute here. And how might a distinguished Spanish philosopher like Jose Ortega y Gasset respond to the clearly vitriolic language directed at the latino community? This is the challenge accepted by Sylvia Gonzalez in examining Trump as the “face” of the masses. We believe that our panel will be of interest to all students of political theory, American politics, changing dynamics in global politics, and anyone interested in a robust exchange on current events.

Green Party
- Steve Lem, Kutztown University
Independence Party of Minnesota
- Melanie Freeze, Carleton College
Working Families Party
- Bilal Sekou, University of Hartford
United Utah Party
- Richard Davis, Brigham Young University

At a time when major party registration is declining in the United States, particularly among younger voters, minor political parties are forming and gaining support at the state and national levels. In the 2016 presidential election, the combined vote for all minor party and independent presidential candidates was 6 percent. It was the first time since 1912 that two non-major presidential candidates had done that well. In addition, state-centric parties are forming and gaining support. In the past two decades, new political parties have formed in South Carolina, Minnesota, Oregon, and Utah. The purpose of the panel is to discuss the growth, organization, appeal, and future of select minor parties that have formed in the past two decades and have contested elections in the 21st century. The participants each will discuss the current status and appeal of a national, regional, or state-centric party. The panelists will be: Chair Richard Davis, BYU Independence Party of Minnesota Melanie Freeze, Carlton College Working Families Party Bilal Sekou, University of Hartford Vermont Progressive Party Bertram Johnson, Middlebury College Green Party Steve Lem, Kutztown University United Utah Party Richard Davis, BYU

Pluralism poses many challenges to liberal democracies. While liberal democracies are often seen to be pluralist, there are issues of what the limits to this pluralism should be; how should be people with different political views compromise with one another; and how people with different political views see each other. How can people with deeply felt views about justice accept others with very different views? what are the limits to this acceptance?

While a number of race and gender studies focus on politics at the national level, this panel is devoted to enhancing our understanding of politics at more localized levels. The first three papers discuss the power and politics of mayors. The fourth paper examines intersectional attitudes toward marijuana decriminalization in Washington, D.C. The final paper uses a legislative simulation with high school students to understand if adolescents' policy interests are gendered.

Political Parties

Chair
Jennifer Nicoll Victor, George Mason University

Discussants
Gregory Koger, University of Miami
Jonathan Ladd, Georgetown University
Seth Masket, University of Denver
Hans Noel, Georgetown University
Amy Erica Smith, Iowa State University

Participants: Bloggers from The Mischiefs of Faction, blog about parties, including: Jennifer Nicoll Victor (chair), Seth Masket, Hans Noel, Amy Erica Smith, Jonathan Ladd, Gregory Koger Description: Political scientists have long recognized the essential role that political parties play in representative democracies. Theoretically, parties are key institutions that help candidates, voters, and policy makers solve collective action problems endemic to democracy. But parties have suffered attacks recently, both within the U.S. and around the globe, in the forms of antipathy, allegations of corruption, negative partisanship, and anti-partisanship. This panel will engage in a discussion about the health of modern political parties in the US and elsewhere drawing on theory and evidence to help us understand whether parties are serving their vital functions, and if they are not, what reforms might be productive. The panelists will discuss the possible unintended consequences of some proposed reforms, and will seek to draw useful comparisons across history and political units. The panel includes several regular “staff” writers from the political science blog Mischiefes of Faction, and will include a discussion of the role of political scientists as public scholars. What is the role of political scientists in engaging with, advocating for, or designing party reforms?

Abby Cordova, University of Kentucky

Across the Americas, 183 million people work informally. Most informal workers interact with politicians and bureaucrats as citizens, voters, and protesters. Additionally, informal workers increasingly run for elected office. Despite these numbers and activities, few political scientists have systematically documented or theorized why and how informality affects political behavior and institutions. The papers in this roundtable make up a special issue of Latin American Politics and Society that will investigate the impact of informal workers, markets, and politics on political behavior and institutions. The issue brings together innovative research from across the Americas to develop new insights into the political economy of informality. The round table will workshop the manuscripts ahead of submission.

Puerto Rican Self-determination: A History of Struggles and Praxis
  Maria Elena Pizarro, John Jay College of Criminal Justice

The roundtable will discuss the emergence of popular responses to the inadequate and failed policies of both, the Commonwealth and U.S. governments, to address the political, social, and economic devastation suffered by all Puerto Ricans as the result of a severe financial crisis and two powerful hurricanes in 2017. The U.S. government’s response to the financial bankruptcy of the Island was the imposition of the Financial Oversight & Management Board, which more than anything else, eradicated almost completely what was left of a diminished Puerto Rican autonomy. The recent political turmoil, caused in part by widespread corruption, and the inhumane austerity policies condoned by the Roselló government, led to massive popular protests culminating in the government’s ouster in July of this year. Presenters will therefore, examine the importance of grassroots community responses/actions by Puerto Ricans to address the ongoing economic and political crises. The discussion will focus on the role of the transnational community formed by the Puerto Ricans in the home country and the Diaspora, (largely in the United States); and more broadly, revisit a more than a century old debate, about the quality, scope, and nature of Puerto Rican sovereign rights. What does the right of self-determination mean in the current conditions in Puerto Rico? Should the international community pay closer attention to all indigenous efforts by Puerto Ricans demanding the right of self-determination to understand what it means, or could look like within its de jure political status as an “unincorporated” U.S. territory? This can aid in advancing not only the prospects for Puerto Rican self-determination, but also revealing alternative views of self-determination useful for the 21st century and beyond.

Our current political moment requires that we take a moment to understand how policing in communities of color shapes political behavior. The first two papers on the panel use innovative quantitative research methods to produce a behavioral theory of discrimination in policing and map patterns of discourse around policing. The next three papers examine how police behavior influences trust among racial and ethnic minorities, if use of force is equally applied, and whether increased levels of state-sanctioned violence against Black women stimulates their political participation. The final paper inspects Barack Obama’s responses to police involved shootings of Black Americans to better understand his rhetorical techniques.
